TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD MY LORD ARCH-BISHOP OF CANTERBVRIE, PRIMATE AND ME-TROPOLITANE OF AL ENGLAND, AND ONE OF her Maiesties most honorable priuie Councell,

IOHN STOVV wisheth increase as well of all beaunty graces, as worldly blessings.

IT IS NOW NIGH FORTY yeeres (Right reuerend Father) since I first addressed al my cares and cogitations to the studie of Histories and search of Antiquities: the greatest part of which time I haue diligently imploied in collecting such matters of this kingdome, as I thought most woorthie to be recommended

both to the present and succeeding age. These laborious collections in so long a time haue now at length grown into a large volume, which I was willing to haue committed to the presse, had not the Printer, for some priuate respects, been more desirous to publish Annales at this present. Wherein I haue condescended to him to publish these, which I submit to your gracious and graue consideration, and to the censure of the courteous Reader and learned Antiquaries: relying wholly vpon this comfort, that the truth and credit of my Authors is in no point in-iured, how simple and naked soeuer the stile may be iudged. Neither doe I doubt but they may haue free passage in the world, if they be countenanced vnder your honorable name and protection. Vnto whom I offer, and with al dutifull affection I dedicate both my selfe and them: being hereunto induced, both for that your woorthy predecessor, and my especiall benefactor Archbishop PARKER animated me in the course of these studies, which otherwise I had long since discontinued; and also that your great loue and entire affection to all good letters in generall, and to the Antiquities in particular hath beene so singular, that all which like and loue good studies, doe iustly esteeme you their principall and gracious patrone.

Thus hoping of your fauourable acceptance of this, as but part of that which I intended in a more large volume, I humbly take my leaue.

London this 24. of Nouember 1600.

To the gentle Reader.

Amongst other Bookes which are in this our learned age published in great numbers, there are few, either for the honestie of the matter, or commoditie which they bring to the Commonwealth, or for the pleasantnes of the study & reading, to be preferred before the Chronicles and Histories. What examples of men deserving immortallitie, of exploits woorthy great renowne, of viciuous liuing of the posteritie to be imbraced, of wise handling of weightie affaires, diligently to be marked and aptly to bee applied: what encouragement of Nobilitie to noble feates, what discouragement of vnnatural subjects from wicked treasons, pernicious rebellions, and damnable doctrines: to conclude, what perswasion to honestie, godlines and vertue of all sorts, what dissuasion from the contrarie is not plentifully in them to bee found? So that it is as hard a matter for the Readers of Chronicles, in my fantasie, to passe without some colours of wisdome, inuitements to vertue, and loathing of naughty facts, as it is for a well fauoured man to walke vp and downe in the hote parching sunne, and not to be therewith sun-burned. They therefore which with long studie, earnest good will, and to their great costs and charges haue brought hidden Histories from duskie darkenesse to the sight of the world, and haue bene diligent obseruers of Commonwealths, and noted for the posteritie the fleeting maners of the people, and accidents of the times: deserue (at the least) thanks for their paines, and to be misreported of none, seeing they haue laboured for all. I write not this to complaine of some mens ingratitude towards me (although iustly I might) but to shew the commodities which ensue of the reading of Histories, that seeing they are so great and so many, all men would (as they ought) employ their diligence in the honest, fruitfull, and delectable perusing of the same, and so to account of the Authors, as of men carefull for their Countrie: and to confesse, if neede require, by whome they haue taken profite.

Note that the vngratefull back-biter slayeth three at once, himselfe by his owne malice, him that crediteth his false tales, and him that he backbiteth.

It is nowenigh forty yeeeres since (I seeing the confuse order of our late English Chronicles, and the ignorant handling of ancient affaires) leauing mine owne peculiar gaines, consecrated my selfe to the search of our famous Antiquities. What I haue done in them before time, the former editions of my Summarie, and other my Chronicles, as also of other mens, wherein I haue bestowed no small labours, may well testifie, but how farre (be it spoken without arrogancie) I haue laboured for the truth more than some other, this last edition (an abstract of a farre larger worke which I haue gathered, and meant to haue published) will evidently declare. Wherein, that I differ from the inordinate and unskilfull collections of other men, it is no matter well, seeing that I do not fully agree with my selfe, as some malicious persons haue fondly.

The Preface to the Reader.

fondly charged me: but let it be considered, that there is nothing perfect at the first, and that it is incident to mankind to erre and slippe some times, but onely the point of fantastickall fooles, to perseuer and continue in their errors. Wherefore, seeing that the perusing of ancient Records and best approoued Histories of all times (not without great difficultie obtained) doe not onely mooue me, but for their authority drine me to acknowledge both mine and other mens errors, and in acknowledging to correct them, I trust to obtaine thus much at your hands, that at the least you will call to remembrance a most gentle and wise lawe of the politike Persians, wherein it was enacted, that a man accused to be in their lawes a trespasser, and found guilty of the crime, should not straightway be condemned, but after a diligent inquirie and search of his whole life and conuersation (no slander imputed unto him as of importance), if the number of his laudable facts did counteruaile the contrarie, he was full quit of the trespassse. The same law doe I wish the Readers of these my Chronicles to put in re, that if the errors be not so plentifull, as Histories truly alleadged, they will beare with them: for as I promised, so haue I tried all matters woorthy of immortallitie, by the certaine touchstone of best allowed Historiographers: and yet notwithstanding, some faults by misprinting haue escaped the correction, which easily may be seene and amended by the diligent Reader.

A BRIEFVE DESCRIPTION OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, WALES, AND CORNWALL.

RITAINE, or Brutanne which by two names is called England and Scotland, is an Iland in the Ocean Sea, situate right over against France: one part of which the Englishmen do inhabit, another part Scots, the third part Welshmen, and the fourth part Cornishmen. All they either in language, conditions, or lawes, doe differ among themselves.

England (so called of Englishmen, which did winne the same) is the greatest part, and is divided into xl. Counties, which wee call Shires; whereof tenne (that is to say) Kent, fourte Counties of Shires,

Sussex, Surrey, Southampton, Barkshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Devonshire and Cornwall, doe containe the first part of that Iland: which part bounding toward the South, standeth betwene the Thames and the Sea.

From thence to the river of Trent, which passeth through the middle of England be sixtene shires, whereof the first sixe (standing Eastward) are Essex, Middlesex, Hartfordshire, Suffolke, Northfolke, and Cambridge shire: the other ten which stand more in the middle of the Country are these: Bedforde, Huntingdon, Buckingham, Oxford, Northampton, Rutland, Leicesters, Nottingham, Warwick, & Lincoln. After these there be sixe which border Westward vpon Wales, as Gloucester, Hereford, Worcester, Shropshire, Stafford, Chester, & Cheshire. About the middle of the Region lie Darbshire, Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Cumberland. On the left hand toward the West is Westmerland. Against the same is the Bishopricke of Durham, & Northumberland, which boundeth vpon the North in the Marches of Scotland.

These shires be divided into xlii. Bishopricks, which by a Greke worde, be called Dioceses. Of which Dioceses, Canterburie hath Kent. Rochester hath part of Kent. London hath Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hartford. Gloucester hath Sussex. Winchester hath Hampshire, Surrey, & the Isle of Wight. Salisbury hath Barkshire, and Wiltshire. Exeter hath Devonshire and Cornwall. Bath and Wells hath Somersetshire. Worcester hath Worcestershire, and part of Warwickshire. Gloucester hath Gloucestershire. Hereford hath part of Shropshire, and Herefordshire. Couentrie and Lichfield hath Staffordshire, Darbshire, part of Warwickshire, & part of Shropshire. Lincoln which is the greatest, lying betwene the Thames and Humber, hath Lincoln, Leicesters, Huntingdon, Bedford, Buckingham, and the residue of

Hartford.

Hartfordshire. Ely hath Cantabriggeshire, and the Isle of Ely. Norwich hath Suffolke and Norfolk, and part of Cantabriggeshire. Oxford hath Oxfordshire. Peterborough hath Northamptonshire and Rutland. Wiltshire hath Wiltshire. And this is the prouince of the Archbishop of Canterburie, which is the Primate of all England, with Wales. The Archbishop of Yorke, hath Yorkeeshire, Nottinghamshire, and a p[ar]ce of Lancashire. The Bishop of Durham hath the Bishopricke so commonly called, and Northumberland. Chester hath Cheshire, most part of Lancashire, Richmond, part of Flintshire, and part of Denbighshire. Carlisle containeth Cumberland and Westmerland: and this is the other Prouince of the Archbishop of Yorke, which is another Primate of England, & was of long time also Primate of all Scotland: but these Dioceses take their names of the Cities where those Seas bee placed, the chiefe whereof, is London, where in the beginning was the Archbishop's See, but afterwarde transposed to Canterbury, a citie in Kent, placed in a soile amiable and pleasant.

Thames.

London standeth in Middlesex, on the North side of the Thames. That most excellent and goodlie Riuer hath first the name of Isle, and beginneth in Coteswolde in Gloucestershire, about a mile from Elibery, and as much from the hie way called Fosse: and it taketh first the name of Tamise, nere to Dorchester byrge, where the Riuer Came and the foresaid Isle meete, and so with a maruellous quiet course it passeth by London, and then breaketh into the French Ocean by maine tydes, which twise in foure and twentie houres space both ebbe and flowe more then threescore miles, to the great commoditie of travellers, by which all kindes of Marchandise be easily conueied to London, the principall store and staple for all commodities within this Realme. Upon the same Riuer is placed a stone byrge, a worke verie rare and marvellous, which byrge hath (reckoning the draw byrge) twentie arches made of fouresquare stone, of height threescore foote, and of breadth thirty foote, distant one from another twentie foote, compact and ioined together with vaults & cellers: Upon both sides be houses builded, y<sup>e</sup> it seemes rather a continual street then a byrge.

London byrge.

The Ocean sea doeth bound England, the first part of Brytaine, East and South, Wales & Cornwall West. The Riuer of Tweede diuident England and Scotland, North. The length of the Ilande beginneth at Portsmouth in the South part, and endeth at Tweede in the North, containing 220. miles.

This Realme aboue other is most fruitfull on this side Humbye: for beyond it is fuller of mountaines. And although to the holders of that Countrey a farre off, it maie seeme plaine, yet it is full of manie hilles, and those for the most part volde of trees, the balles whereof bee verie delectable, inhabited for the most part by noble men, who according to ancient and olde order, desire not to dwell in Cities, but nere vnto balles and riuers in seuerall villages, for auoiding of vehement windes, because that Ilande naturally is stormie.

Humber.

Humbye hath his beginning a little on this side Yorke, and by and by runneth Southward, and then holdeth his course Eastward, and so into the maine sea, greatly encreased by the riuers of Paine and Trent.

Trent

Trent beginneth a little from Stafford, running through Darbithire, and Leicesterhire, passing by Lichfield and Nottingham on the right hand, and Dune on the left hand: so that both those Riuer doe make an Ilande which is called Auxolme, and then ioyning together on this side Kingstone vpon Hull, a goodly marchant towne, they fall into Humbze: by which Riuer they may arrive out of France, Germanie and Denmarke.

The Riuer of Trent.

England is fruitfull of beasts, and aboundeth with cattell: whereby the inhabitants be rather for the most part grassers then plowmen, because they giue themselves more to feeding, then to tillage. So that almost the third part of the Countrey is employed to cattell, Dore red and fallowe, Goates, (whereof there be store in the North parts) and Conies: for euerie where there is solly maintenance of those kindes of beasts, because it is full of great woods: whereof there riseth pastime of hunting, greatly exercised, specially by the Nobility and Gentlemen. (Andrew Bourd saith, there be more Parkes in England then in all Europe beside.)

Andrew Bourd.

Scotland another part of Bytaine, (whereof in this place I haue thought god to treat at large, that no further mention of the situation thereof might be made hereafter) beganne sometime at the hill called Grampius, now called Grantelbeine stretching to the furthest coast Northward, but after the ouerthrowe of the Pictes, it beganne at the Riuer Tweede, and sometimes at the Riuer of Tyne, the fortune of warres altering the same, as it doeth all other thinges. Therefore the length of Scotland from Tweede to the furthest coast, is esteemed to be 480. miles: but as Scotland is longer then England, so it is narrowe, and endeth like a wedge. For the mountaine Grampius is euill fauoured and craggie, which Tacitus in the life of Iulius Agricola doth remember, pearcing through the bowels of Scotland, from the coast of the Germanie sea, that is to say, from the mouth of the Riuer of Dee to the Irish sea, euen to the lake of Lomunde, which lieth betwene that countrey and the same hill.

Scotland.

The Riuer of Tweede (which springeth out of a little hill, not farre beyonde Roxborough) is mingled with the Germanie Ocean, ioyning Southwarde with that countrey which is called the Marches, being the East boundes betwene England and Scotland. The saide Riuer of Tweede separateth the Marches from Northumberland, the furthest Countrey of England, hauing prospect to the Germanie sea, the chiefe towne whereof is Barwicke, now in possession of the English.

Cornelius Tacitus.

The Westerne limit of Scotland whilom was Cumberland, which the Riuer of Solue diuideth from Annandale. Betwene these two Regions the Cheviot hilles appeare. Next to the Marches Pictland bordereth, now termed Loughdean, bounding vpon the East, a verie hillie Countrey, barreine almost of anie trees. The most famous townes of the same bee Dunbarre, Haddington, Leith, Northbertwicke, and Edenborough the Kings seafe, where also is the Castell of Maydens, a verie strong and defensible place. The same citie the riuer of Forthera (commonly called the Frith) doth water & passe by: which being caried into the Germanie Ocean, maketh great armies of meres, commonly called the Scottis sea: wherein besides other is the Iland of Saint Columbe, by name called Aemonia. The same riuer againe deuidenth from Loughdean a countrey adioyning (abundant of all thinges) called the Fife, in which countrey are many townes, as Donfermile, Cupre, but the notable towne of Saint Andrew, specially famous for the Vniuersitie, and beautified with the Sea of the Archbishop and Primate of all Scotland. On the other side towardes the Irish side Southward, is Nidisdalia, so called of the Riuer that passeth thereby, where be the strong townes of Douglass and Donriese.

Vpon the South adioyneth Galloway, more abundant of fodder for Cattel, then of Wheate, where is the Towne of Candida Casa, now called Whitherne, and the ancient Temple of saint Ninian, adorneed also with an Episcopal Sea. In those partes besides the towne of Wighton is a lake of a wonderful nature, because the one side in Winter doth freeze, and the other not. By that standeth the countrey of Caricta, once renowned with the Towne Caricton, whereof perchance it toke the name. Aboue Caricta towardes the West, is Elgoria (by which name Ptoleme calleth the countrey) bordering vpon the Ocean, wherein is the lake Lomunde, which is verie broad and large, containing manie Ilands, situate at the foot of the mountaine Gantelsbeine, eight miles from the castell of Donbryton, besides the riuer Bodotria, now named Leuinus, entring into the Riuer of Glota or Glude. Here some do contend that the name of Bodotria is not well applied to Leuinus, because it appeareth by Cornelius Tacitus, that Bodotria and Glota haue sundry passages into the sea, and are clearely disremp tne from the other, as Leuinus and Glota, are not: wherefore they iudge rather the Riuer now called the Frith to be that which of old time had to name Bodotria, and to proue the same they adde many other reasons, which here I omit. But a good space on this side Grampius riseth the Riuer of Taus, the greatest in all Scotland, taking his name of a lake from whence it springeth, which falleth by Atholia and Calidonia by manie places, but chiefly by Perthum now called Saint Johns towne, and lastly by Dundee, in time past called Alestum, and there breaketh into the German sea, and at the mouth forceth great estuaries or armes of the sea, whereof Tacitus maketh mention. Against Taus is Anguise, which by meanes of that riuer is fertile and prosperous, and is deuident from Fife.

To the same vpon the North adioyneth Athol, not the barrenest countrey, as well for water as for plentie of soile. On the other side Arguile sheweth it selfe, which being full of lakes, yieldeth greater plentie of fodder then fruite, whose bittermost bounds stretch so farre, as Ireland is not distant past sixtene miles, about which the promontorie or foreland called Lands head standeth. That coast whilome the Silures did inhabite, as Polidor gathereth by these wordes of Plinie in his 4. booke, the 16. chapter.

Ireland being situate ouer against Brytaine, is distant from the nation of Silures by the shortest cut twentie miles. Howbeit, some other, for that it is manifest by the same Plinie in the same Chapter, and also by other writers, that Brytaine was not in his time well knowne so farre North, suppose hee meant not by this, that the Silures should inhabite Arguile, but rather South.

Wales,

Wales, from whence the passage ouer was better knowne (and as hee might haue vnderstanding) shortest. Where also as well Tacitus as Antoninus seeme to place that people.

Betwene Argile and Leniox Westward lieth the Countrey of Sterling, so called by a towne there. Here the Forrest of Calidonia began on the left side, which within stretcheth farre and broad. This Forrest sometimes bredde white Bulles, long maned like Lyons, which were so wilde as they could not bee tamed, but because the flesh was pleasant and daintie to the mouth, the whole race of them almost is extinguished. There likewise is the Castle of Calydene, situate by Taus called Doucheldine. From a little hill of the Forrest riseth Glouca, or Cluid, which by a broad channell falleth into the Irish Ocean, for stayed in a manner by the bankes of the mountaine Grampius, it slideth into the Sea by great tides, so (as witnesseth Tacitus) the Romanes thought it to be another Island. Of that riuer the Dale was called Gloteuale, which Countrey that Riuer runneth by; and in the same is the Citie of Glasco, a goodlie vniuersitie.

Againe towards the East is layned the Countrey of Anguish and Merne vpon the Sea coast, wherein Fordune by situation is verie strong, and for the reliques of S. Palladius the Scottishe Apostle, famous.

Of the same side of Scotland, is the Countrey of Marre, garnished with a Citie called Aberdone, standing betwene the two riuers of Dona and Dea, with a Schoole also adorne. Then followeth Morrey, which the two notable Riuers doe compasse about, called Nessa and Spea. At the mouth of this last Riuer, standeth the Towne of Elgin, about the banks whereof be huge woods replenished with all sortes of wilde beastes. There is a Lake also called Spina, frozen with plentie of Swannes: but in the middle part standeth the broad Country of Rossia, now called Beane Rozen, stretching to the bittermost angle euen to both the Seas, and the further it goeth Eastward, the better it is inhabited. In the same is a bosome of the Sea, now and then so conuenient for Sailers, as commonly it is called the port of Health, (or the Hauen of Safety) and the towne Thana. The breadth of the Island is verie short, for falling into the forme of a wedge, it is scant xxx. mile ouer, which defended with three promontories like towers, repelleth the great waues and surges of the Sea: and inclosed with two gulfes, which those promontories doe inclose, the entries be quiet and calme, and the water peaceable. The strait of that land is at this day called Cathanes, coasting vpon the Sea Deucalidon.

Thes much of the particulars of Scotland. But the same is in euerie place full of good Hauens and nauigable entries, Lakes, with Marthes, fountaines, verie full of fish, and mountaines, vpon the tops whereof be pleasant plaines, yielding great store of grasse, and plentie of fodder for Cattell, woods likewise full of wilde beastes. That part of the land is well sustained with commodities, and therefore the people hard to be vanquished at any time, by reason the woods and Marthes be at hand for refuge, and hunger eased with venison and fish. Without Scotland in the Irish Seas, are manie Islands nowe discovered, to the number of one hundred and fourtie: some of these in length are thirtie milles, but in breadth not aboue twelue. Amongst them is Iona beautified with the Tombes of the Scottish kings. The Ilanders generally speake Irish, which declareth them to take their originall of the Irish nation. Beyond Scotland toward the North, be the Isles of Orkades, which (as Ptolomie saiesh) bee threescore in number, some lying in the Deucalidon Sea, and some in the Germane Ocean, the principall of which Ilandes is Pamonia, because it is a Bishoppes Sea, and is vnder the gouernement of Scotland. The Ilanders vse the Gothes speech, which argueth them to proceede from the Germanes. They be tall of stature, but verie healthie and lustie of bodie and minde, liuing verie long, although their chieffest foode is fish, for the land almost continually beset with cold, in many places is not able to beare corne, and generally almost without treé or bush. Beyond the Orkades be the Ilandes of Scotland, vnder the king of Scots obedience, and beyond those standeth Thule, in the frozen sea now called Iseland, to which our merchants repaire for fishing once euerie yeare in the Summer. And thus much haue I to saie of the site of Scotland: now of the nature and manners of the people.

The Scots which inhabite in the Southerne part, be well nurtured, and liue in good ciuillie, and the most ciuill vse the English speech. And for that wood there is geason and scant, their common felwell is of a blacke stone, which they dig out of the earth. The other part Northerne, and full of mountaines, a verie rude and homely kinde of people doth inhabite, which are called the Red-shankes or wilde Scots. They be clothed with a mantell and thirte saffroned after the Irish maner, going bare legged to the kiné. Their weapons are bowes and dartes, with a verie broad sword and a dagger, sharpe only at the one side. All speake Irish, feeding on fish, milke, cheese, and flesh, hauing a great number of Cattell. The Scots differ from the English in lawes and customes, because they vse the ciuill lawe as almost other Countreies doe. The English haue their owne lawes and edictes. In certaine other conditions they be not farre vnlike, but their language is one, their habite and complexion like, one courage in battel, and in the Nobilitie one desire & pregnancie in hunting. The Countrey houses bee narrowe, couered with strawe and reede, wherein the people and beastes doe lodge together. Their Townes besides Saint Johns Towne are unwalled, which is to be ascribed to their animositie and hardnesse, firing all their succour and helpe alwaie in the ballancie of their bodie. The Scottes are verie wise, as their learning declareth. For to what soeuer Art they do applie themselves, they easily profite in the same. But the idle and slothful, and such chieflie as thum and auoide labour, liue in great poverty, and yet will not sticke to boast of their nobilitie & gentrie, as though it were more seemely for the honest to lacke, then comely (by exercise of some honest Arte) to get their liuing. But the Scots generally be deuoute obseruers of Religion. And thus much of Scotland.

Wales.

Wales the third part of Brytaine lieth vpon the lefte hand, which like a Promontorie or forcland, or an Ile (as it were) on euerie side is compassed with the maine sea, except it be on the Southeast part with the Riuer of Sa-

brine, commonly called Seuerne, which diuideth Wales from Englande, although some late writers affirme Hereford to be a bound betwene Wales and England, and say, that Wales beginneth at Chepstowe, where the Riuer Wye (augmented with an other Riuer called Lugge) passing by Hereforde, both runne into the sea, which Riuer riseth in the middle of Wales out of that hill (but vncertaine whether out of that spring that Sabine doth,) for euen to that place there goeth a great arme of the sea, which passing through the land westward, on the right hand leaueth Cornewall, and on the left Wales: which Topographie or description, although it bee newe, yet I thought good to followe. Therefore Wales is extended from the Towne of Chepstowe, where it beginneth almost by a straight line a little aboue Shrovsburie, euen to Westcheffer Northward. Into that part, so manie of the Brytaines as remained aliuie after the slaughter and losse of their Countrey, at the length being driuen to their thistles, did repaire, as ancient writings report, where partly through refuge of the mountaines, and partlie of the woods and marshes, they remained in safetie: which part they enjoy euen to this daie. That land afterwards the Englishmen did call Wales: and the Brytaines the inhabitants of the same, Walshmen: for amongst the Germanis, Walshy man, signifieth a stranger, an alien, an outborne or strange man, that is, such a one, as hath a contrarie language from theirs, for Wal in their tongue is called a stranger borne, as an Italian or Frenchman, which differ in speech from the Germaine, Man signifieth Homo, which is a man in English. Therefore Englishmen, a people of Germanie, after they had wonne Brytaine, called the Brytaines, which escaped after the destruction of their Countrey, after their Countrey manner, Walshmen, because they had another tongue or speech besides theirs: and the lande which they inhabited Wales, which name afterward both to the people and Countrey did remaine. By this meane the Brytaines with their kingdome lost their name. But they which affirme that name to be deriued of their King or Quene, without doubt be deceiued. The Countrey soile towards the sea coast, and in other places in the vailles and plaines, is most fertile, which yeldeth both to man and beast great plentie of fruite and grasse: but in other places for the most part it is barraine and lesse fruitfull, because it lacketh tillage: for which cause husbandmen doe liue hardly, eating Oaten cakes, and drinke milke mixt with water. There be many Towns and strong Castles, and foure Bishopricks, if the Bishopricke of Hereford bee counted in England, as the late Writers declare. The first Bishopricke is Meneue, so called of Meneua, which at this day they call Saint Dauid, a Citie verie auncient, situated vpon the sea coast, and boundeth Westward toward Ireland. Another is Landaffe, the third Bangor, and the fourth Saint Asaph, which bee vnder the Archbishop of Canterburie. The Walshmen haue a language from the Englishmen, which (as the saie that fetch their pedegree from the Troians) doth partly sounde of the Troian antiquitie, and partly of the Greeke. But howsoeuer it is, the Walshmen do not pronounce their speech so pleasantly and gently as the Englishmen do, because they speake moze in the throte: and contrariwise, the Englishmen rightly fol-

Giraldus Cambrensis.

Foure Bishops in Wales.

folowing the Latines, doe expresse their voice somewhat within the lips, which to the hearers seemeth pleasant and swete. And thus much of Wales, the third part of Brytaine.

Cornwall.

Now followeth the fourth and last part of Brytaine named Cornwall. This part beginneth on that side which standeth toward Spaine Westward: Toward the East, it is of bredth fourescore and ten miles, extending a little beyond S. Germain, which is a verie famous village, situate on the right hand vpon the Sea coast, where the greatest bredth of that Countrey is but twenty miles: for this parcell of land on the right hand is compassed with the coast of the maine Sea: and on the left hand with that arme of the Sea, which (as before is declared) parteth the land, and runneth by to Chepstow, where the countrey is in forme of a horne: For at the first it is narrow, and then groweth broader a little beyond the said towne of S. Germain. Eastward it bordereth vpon England: West, South, and North, the maine sea is round about it: it is a very barren soile, yielding fruit more through trauell of the tillers and husbandmen, then through the godnesse of the ground: but there is great plentie of Lead and Tinne, in the myning and digging whereof doth specially consist the liuing and sustentation of the inhabitants. Their tongue is farre dissonant from English, but it is much like to the Walsh tongue, because they haue many words common to both tongues: yet this difference there is betwixen them, when a Walsh man speaketh, the Cornish man rather vnderstandeth many words spoken by the Walshman, then the whole tale he telleth; whereby it is manifest, that those three people doe vnderstand one another, in like maner as the Southern Scots doe perceiue and vnderstand the Northern. But it is a thing very rare and maruellous, that in one Island there should be such variety of speeches. Cornwall is in the Diocesse of Exeter, which was once thought to be counted the fourth part of the Island, for the contrarietie of the language. Afterwards the Normans, which constituted a kingdome of al those 3. parts, reckened Cornwall to be one of the Counties or Shires of the Countrey. Thus much of the particular description of Brytaine, that the whole bodie of the Realme (by the members) maie bee the better knowne to some peraduenture that neuer heard the same before.

The forme of the Island is Triquetra, or three cornered, hauing three corners, or three sides: two whereof, that is to say, the corner toward the East, and the other toward the West (both extending Northwards) are the longest.

The third side which is the South side, is farre shorter then the other: for the Island is greater of length then of bredth. And as in the other two partes is contained the length, even so in the last, the bredth, in which place the bredth beginneth: and so continuing from the South part to the North, it is but narrow. The first and right corner of which Island Eastward, is in Kent, at Douer and Sandwich. From whence to Calais or Boloigne in France, is the distance of thirty miles. From this Angle, which is against France, to the third Angle, which is in the North in Scotland, the maine whereof boundeth vpon Germanie, but no land scene, (and there the Islande is like vnto a wedge euen at the very Angle of the lande in Scotland,) the length is seauen hundred miles. Againe, gaine, the length from this corner at Douer in Kent, to the uttermost part of Cornwall, being S. Michaels mount (which is the West part or West Angle) is supposed to bee three hundred miles. From this left Angle being the West part and the uttermost part of Cornwall, which hath a prospect towarde Spaine, in which part also standeth Ireland, situate betwene Brytaine and Spaine to the North Angle in the further part of Scotland, in which part the Island doeth end, the length is eight hundred miles, in which part there be very good hauens, and safe harboroughes for shippes, and apt passages into Ireland, being not past one daies sayling: but the shorter passage is from Wales to Waterford, a towne in Ireland vpon the Sea coast, much like to that passage betwene Douer and Calais, or somewhat more: but the shortest passage of all, is out of Scotland. From this last Angle to Hampton, which is a towne vpon the sea coast, with a haven so called toward the South, and therefore called Southampton, betwene the Angles of Kent and Cornwall, they do measure by straight line the whole length of the Island, and doe saie, that it containeth eight hundred miles, as the breadth from Meneua or S. Davids to Parmouth, which is in the uttermost part of the Island towardes the East, doth contains two hundred miles, for the breadth of the Island is in the South part, which part is the front and beginning of the land, and endeth narrow, or as it were in a freight. So the circuite or compasse of the Island is, 1800. miles, which is 200. lesse then Caesar doeth reckon or accompt.

Lilius Giraldus.
Solinus,

Here it is recorded by the sacred and most auncient Historie, that after the vniuersall flood, the Isles of the Gentiles were diuided by the posterity of Iapheth the son of Noah, we doubt not but this Isle of Brytaine was also then peopled by his progenie, the history of whome, as it is to bee wished and appertinent to this purpose, so sith it is irrecoverable, not onely vnto vs, but also to other nations, I thinke it better to say nothing therein, then to set downe here Samoths, Magus, Sarron, Druys, and Bardus for his successours, which are vpholden and boulstered onely by the credite and authoritie of a newe small pamphlet falsely forged, & thrust into the world vnder the title of the ancient Historian Berosus. For that is the censure of all the best learned as concerning our common Berosus, which at his first appearing, about one hundred yeeres since, was partly suspect by Lodouicus Vines, afterward conuincd to be fabulous by the learned Gas. Varrerius, in a seuerall Treatise, and nowe vniuersally reiected of all skilfull Antiquaries, as a meere fable, vnworthy the name of Berosus. Therefore I dare not ground the beginning of our Historie vpon the credite thereof, vnlesse I would be preiudiciall to the truth, whereunto I leuell all my indeuour. I hope it shall be sufficient in this History for the Brytaines time, to follow the authoritie of the receiued Brytish History, which Geoffrey Archdeacon of Monmouth translated out of the Brytish tongue about 400. yeeres since, beginning with Brute, who after the progenie of Iapheth seemeth to be first discouerer, namer, and Ruler of this land. Yet before we enter into the Historie of Brute, it shall not bee impertinent to note here, that whereas Pomponius Mela mentioneth that one Hercules killed Albion a giant about the mouth of Rhosne in France, many learned men haue iudged the said Albion to haue ruled here, (sith the Greeke monuments doe alway call this Isle Albion.) and after his death that Hercules came hither, Lilius Giraldus writeth, An ancient Altar also containing the inscription of a vow found in the vttermoost North part of Brytaine 1500. yeeres since, as Solinus reporteth, plainly prooued that Vlysses the renowned Græcian in histenne yeeres trauels, after the sacking of Troy, arriued in this our country.

but as the nature of man is to desire knowledge of many things, and seeking to be satisfied therein, I found in the reuestrie, or treasure of S. Pauls Church in London, (in anno 1451.) an olde historie written (as the Title did specifie) 600. yeres before. Which if it be true, it may both satisfie my desire, and others in the premises: the Authour of the booke, was Thucydides the Grecian, but the translation name was not therein noted: but truly it was right eloquently set forth in the Latine tongue. The content of the wordes I doe not now well remember, but the tenure of the sentence, was well nere in this sort, as I shall declare, Heraulds be they, which our Elders were wont to call Heroes, that is to saie, those which were greater or surpassing all men in maiestie, and yet inferiours to the gods. For whom the people of antiquity did perceiue to be notable, and surmounting all others in his acts, and feates, renowned in vertues, and friendly, or gracious vnto them: him would they magnifie and craie in the highest degree, and as it were, with their good wordes make them consins to God almightie, placing them amongst the Gods, if it so were, that they had wrought some miraculous feate aboue the common course of nature. But if there were no such miraculous or wonderfull deedes, but that through their vertues they seemed wonderfull and honourable: then thought they to call such persons, not altogether gods, nor yet simple men, but inuented out a meane worde and name for them, calling them Heroes, as it were halfe gods. And of this worde Heroes or Heros, groweth by corruption of vse this name Herald. Albeit some saie that those Heroes were olde souldiers, that had spent all the age welnoure in the warres: out of the which sort the Heraulds ought to be chosen, and so the terme Herald seemeth to bee a Dutch worde, and to sounde as much as an olde souldier, or man of war. But the first that begunne and ordeyned this order, was Dionysius, the which was the first also that invaded India with an armed power, and gathered the rude people there together, which liued in woodes and desertes like wilde beastes, feeding on leaues, barks of trees, and rawe fleshe: teaching them to liue after a ciuile order and fashion: also to build Townes and villages, to worship the gods, to till and plow the earth, to plant vineyards, and make wine, to weare apparel, to anoint and trim their bodies, and to be short, to liue after a humaine maner. And now following the common opinion, after Geoffrey Monmouth.

Brute diuided the whole Island among his three sonnes, which hee had by Inogen his wife, Loecine, Camber, and Albanaet. Vnto Loecine he gaue the middle part betwixt the Humber and Seuerne, which of him was called Loegria. To Camber he gaue all the region beyond Seuern, which of him toke the name of Cambria, and is now called Wales. To Albanaet he gaue all the landes beyond Humber, which of his name was called Albania: after which partition he deceased, when he had reigned foure and twenty yeres, and was buried at new Troy.

Loecine, the eldest sonne of Brute, reigned twentie yeres: hee chased the Hunnes, which invaded this realme; and pursued them so sharply, that many of them with their king, were drowned in a river which then parted England and Scotland. And for so much as the king of Hunnes, named Humber, was was there drowned, the river is til this day named Humber. This king Locrine had to wife Guendoline, daughter of Corineus, Duke of Cornwall, by whom he had a sonne named Madan. He also kept as Paramour, the beautiful Lady Estrilde, by whom he had a daughter named Sabine. And after the death of Corineus, he put from him the said Guendoline, and wedded Estrilde: but Guendoline repaired to Cornwall, where she gathered a great power, and fought with King Locrine, and slew him. He was buried at new Troy. She drowned the Lady Estrilde, with her daughter Sabine in a river, that after the young maidens name is call Seuerne.

Seuerne.

Guendoline the daughter of Corineus and wife to Locrine (for so much as Madan her sonne was too young to gouerne the land) was by common assent of all the Brytains, made ruler of the whole Isle of Brytan, which she well and discretely ruled, to the comfort of her subjects, fifteen yeares, and then left the same to her sonne Madan.

Madan, the sonne of Locrine and Guendoline, was made ruler of Brytaine: he vsed great tyzanny among his Brytons: and being at his disport of hunting, he was deuoured by wild Wolves, when he had reigned xl. yeares. He left two sons, named Memprius and Manlius.

The king deuoured by Wolves.

Memprius, the sonne of Madan, being king, by treason slew his brother Manlius, after whose death he liued in more tranquillitie, where though he fell in sloth, and so to lechery, taking the wives and daughters of his subjects: and lastly, became so euill, that he sought his wife and concubines, and fell to the sinne of Sodomitie with beasts, whereby hee became odible to God and man. And going on hunting, hee lost his companie, and was destroyed of wilde Wolves, whereof the land was then full, when he had reigned twentie yeares.

Ebranke, the sonne of Memprius, was made ruler of Brytaine, he had xx. wives, of whom he receiued xx. sonnes, and xx. daughters: which were sent by their fathers to Alba Siluius, the fourth king of Albanois in Italy, to be married to the Albanes. This Ebranke first after Brutus attempted to inuade France with an armie, as Iacobus Bergomas saith in his first of his Chronicles, and Iacobus Lessabeus in the description of Henault affirmeth the same, and that he was driuen backe by Brunchildis Lord of Henault with no small losse of his men. Aslaracus the second sonne of Ebranke, with the rest of his younger brethren 18 at the least, by the aide of Alba Siluius, conquered all Germanie, which was then no great matter, for then Europe was verie small inhabited, saue onely about the Sea coasts, as Dalmatia, Italie and the coasts of France, as in reading the histories may easily be seene how the East people at sundry times came swarming into Europe. Of these brethren had Germanie the name, a Germanis fratribus, that had subdued it. Ebranke was a founder of manie Cities (sayeth Bergomas) as Alclud in Albania (nowe Scotland) which is after Hector Boetius, Dunbretaine, but other thinke the same to be cleane destroyed. He made the Castell of Maidens called Edebrough. Hee made also the Castell of Wamburgh. A legion of the Romaines (as Vigetius reporteth) contained 6000. warriours or moe: which legion was deuided into tenne bandes, but the first passed all the rest, both in number of souldiers, and also in estimation: for this bande bare the Eagle, which was the chiefest standarde of the Romaines. This first bande contained 1105. footemen, heavy armed horsemen 132. and was named Cobors milliaria, that is to saie, a companie of a thousand and moe souldiers. This bande is the head of all the legion: whensoever they must fight, these begin the battaile, and are first set in order in the front of the battaile. The second bande containeth 555. footemen, and 66. horsemen of heauie armour, and this bande is called Cobors quingentaria, that is to saie, a companie of 500. and moe souldiers. The third bande likewise hath 555. footemen, and 66. horsemen. The fourth bande hath 555. footemen, and 66. horsemen. The fift bande hath as manie. These five bandes are set in aray in the first battaile. The first bande hath 555. footemen, and 66. horsemen. The seauenth bande hath 555. footemen, 66. horsemen. The eighth bande hath 555. footemen, 66. horsemen. The ninth bande hath 555. footemen, 66. horsemen. The tenth hath 555. footemen, 66. horsemen. These tenne bandes make a full and perfect legion, containing, 6100. footemen, and 726. horsemen. Augustine. At which time the Bishop of Rome interdicted it for heresies that sel among the Barons & Brytains together mixt, so saith Harding. He builded Caer Badon or Bath, and made there a temple to Apollo, and placed there a flame: he made also the hote Bathe, and practised his necromancie: hee decked himselfe in feathers, and presumed to sit, but by falling on his temple, he brake his necke, when he had reigned xx. yeres.

Lere sonne of Bladud succeded his father. He builded Caer Lair vpon the Riuer of Soze, now called Lyecester, and made there a Temple of Ianus, placing a flame to gouerne the same. He had three daughters, Gonoril, Regan, and Cordeilla, which Cordeilla for her vertue and wisdom towards her father, succeded him in the kingdome. When he had reigned xl. yeres hee deceased, and was buried vnder the channel of the Riuer Soze, within Leicester. This vault vnder the earth was built in honour of Ianus Bifrons. There all the workmen of that Citie, when the solemnitie of the daie came, begunne all things that they had to do the yere following.

Morgan, the eldest sonne of Dame Gonorilla, claimed Brytain, and warred on his nephew Cunedagius, that was king of Camber (that now is Wales) & of Cornwall: but Cunedagius met with Morgan in Wales, & there slew him: which place is called Glamorgan til this day. And then Cunedagius was king of al Brytain. He builded a Temple of Mars at Perche, that now is S. Johns towne in Scotland, & placed there a flame: hee builded another of Minerva in Wales, which now is named Bangor. The thirde hee made of Mercurie in Cornwall, where he was bozne. He reigned xxxiii. yeres, and was buried at new Troy.

Riuallus, sonne of Cunedagius, succeded his father, in whose time it rained blood 3. daies: after which tempest ensued a great multitude of venemous flies, which slew much people, & then a great mortality throughout this land, caused almost desolation of the same. This Riualus raygned ouer this whole Iland xlvi. yeres, & then deceased, & was buried at Caerbank, & now is York. Rome was builded in Italy, by Remus and Romulus 356. yeres after Brute arrived in this land.

Mulmutius Dunwallo, the sonne of Cloten, Duke of Cornwall, reduced this Realme into one Monarchie, being before by ciuill warres and dissension seuered and brought into diuers dominions: he was the first that wore a crowne of gold: he constituted good lawes, which long after were called Mulmutius Lawes. These lawes holy Gildas wrote out of the Brytish speech into Latine. He gave priuiledges vnto Temples, and ploughes, and began to make the foure notable waies in Brytaine. He reigned xl. yeres, leaving after him two sonnes, Belinus and Brennus.

Belinus and Brennus, sonnes of Mulmutius and Cornouenna, deuised this whole Isle of Brytaine betwene them. Vnto Beline the elder brother was appointed England, Wales, and Cornwall. Vnto the other the North part beyond Humber. This Brennus, a yong man, desirous of glory and dominion, raised warre against Beline. But in the conclusion by the meanes of their mother, they were accorded, and Brennus being wholly giuen to the studie of warre, left his countrey to the gouernance of his brother, and went into France amongst the Galles, where for his excellent qualities he was greatly esteemed, & made of them their soueraigne Captaine, with whom he passed into Italy, sacked Rome, and expelling the Tuscans, builded Millaine, Brescia, Como, Bergamo, Vincenza, Trent, and Verona, which he called after his own name Brennona. After this (as writeth Trogus Pompeius, abridged by Iustine) Brennus leader of the Galles, (he nameth him not a Brytaine) raised an host of 150000. footemen, and 15000. horsemen, and inuaded Macedone againe. Whom when Sophenes sawe how they wasted the Countrey and villages, he met them with his host of Macedones well appointed. But by reason they were fewe, and their enemies many, they were sone put to the worse. Wherefore while the acedones being beaten, kept them within the walles of their cities, Brennus like a conquerour, againe whom no man durst shewe his head to make resistance, foraged all the Isles of Macedone. And from thence as though those bottes and spoiles seemed to bafe and simple in his eye, he turned his minde to the Temples of the Gods immortall, malapertly scoffing that the Gods were rich, and ought to depart liberally to men. Therefore hee tooke his journey towards Delphos, setting more by the gaine of the golde that had bene offered to the Gods, then by their displeasure.

The Temple of Apollo at Delphos, is situate in the mount Parnassus, vpon a cliffe on euery side falling steepe downe. Here the confluence of men hath made a populous Citie. Moreover both the Temple and the towne are enclosed with the steepenesse of the rocke. The middle part of the rocke inward is in fashion like a Theatre, by meanes whereof when men make any shouting, or any trumpet is sounded, the same breaketh and redoundeth in such wise vpon the stones from one to another, that the Echo is heard double and triple, the noise resounding farre louder then it went forth. The which causeth the ignorant to stand in more feare, thinking it to be the presence of the Godhead. In the winding of the rocke, almost midwaie to the toppe of the hill, there is a little plaine, and in the same a deepe hole into the ground, which seemeth to giue oracles: out of the which a certaine colde breath ascending vppward, stirreth the mindes of the Prophets into a madnesse, and so compelleth them to giue answer to such as come for counsaile. In the same place therefore, there are to be seene manie and rich giftes of kings and peoples. Wherefore when Brennus came within the view of the Temple, he was in doubt a great while, whether he were better to attempt the matter forthwith, or giue his souldiours that nights respite to rest them. Euridanus and Thessalonus, who for couetousnesse of the pray, had soynded themselves with him, willed to cut off all delate, while their enemies were vnprouided, whereas by giuing them that nights respite, their enemies should perchance get both courage and succour: but the common souldiers of the French men, when after long penurie, they found a Countrey replenished with wine, and all other kinde of victualles, they dispersed themselves in the fieldes, making haucke of all things like Conquerours, by which meanes the Delphians had respite to lay for themselves, and manned the Towne by the helpe of their neighbours, or neuer the Frenchmen could be called from the Wine sat to the standard. Brennus had threescore and fife thousand chosen souldiers of the best in all his host, whereas the Delphians were in all but 40000. fighting men. In disdain of which small handfull Brennus to the intent to sharpen the mindes of his men, shewed them all, what a rich and plentifull praye they shoulde haue. The Frenchmen being by this vouching of their Captaine, or rather by their owne beholding, stirred vp, and also wounded with the wine they had potized in the day before, without respect of any danger ran headlong to the encounter. On the contrarie part, the Delphians putting more trust in God then in their owne strength, resisted their enemies, and that with stones, and what with their weapons, threw the Frenchmen (as they scaled) headlong from the top of the mountaine. While the two parts were thus striving one with another, sodainelie the Priestesses of all the Temples, and the Prophets, with their haire about their eares, &c. like men distract and out of their wits, came running into the forefront of the battaile, crying out, that while they were all making their supplications to God for aide, they met a young man of beauty and personage, far excellling anie mortall creature, and in his company two Virgins in armor, wherefore they besought them, seeing the gods did garde their standarde, they should not sticke to dispatch their enemies. And therewithall they forthwith perceived that God was present on their side. For both a peece of the mountaine being broken off, by a sodaine earthquake, overthelmed the French hoste, and the thickest of their enemies (not without great slaughter) were opened and put to flight. In the necke where of there ensued a tempest, with haile, thunder and lightning, consuming as manie as were any thing soze wounded. The captaine Brennus himselfe not being able to abide the smarte of his woundes, toke a sword and killed himselfe. Thus farre abridged out of Iustine.

Elanius, called also Danius, was king of Brytaine nine yeres.

Morindus, the bastard sonne of Danius, beganne to raigne in Brytaine: hee fought with a king who came out of Germanie, and sette him with all his power. Moreover, out of the Irish seas in his time came forth a wonderfull Monster, which destroyed much people: whereof the king hearing, would of his valiant courage needes fight with it, by whome he was cleane deuoured, when he had reigned eight yeres.

Gorbomannus, eldest sonne of Morindus, raygned xi. yeres: a Prince iust and religious: he renued the Temples of his gods, and gouerned his people in peace and wealth. This Gorbomannus builded Grantham in Lincolnshire. Our English Chronicle saith, he builded both the towines of Cambridge and Grantham: but seeing that Cambridge in ancient Chronicles is called Grant (as it is also Grandchester, Catergrant, and Granthidge) it was an easie matter (as Grammmarians know) to translate Grantham into Cambridge, and so ascribe the building of both Townes to him that builded but one, or neither of them both.

Archigallo, brother to Gorbomannus, was crowned king of Brytaine: he was in conditions unlike to his brother: for he deposed the noblemen, and exalted the vnnoble. He extorted from men their goods to enrich his treasure: for which cause by the estates of the Realme he was deprived of his royall dignitie, when he had reigned v. yeres.

Elidurus, the third sonne of Morindus, and brother to Archigallo, was elected King of Brytaine: a vertuous and gentle Prince, who gouerned his people iustlie. As he was hunting in a forest, by chaunce he met with his brother Archigallo, whome most louinglie he embraced, and found the meanes to reconcile him to his Lords, and then resigned to him his royall dignitie, when he had reigned v. yeres.

Vigenius and Peredurus, after the taking of their brother, reigned together seven yeres. Vigenius then died, and Peredurus reigned after alone two yeres. Hee builded the Towne of Pickering in the north partes of Poike-shire.

Casibelanus, the son of Hely, after the death of his brother Lud, was made gouernour of Brytaine, which ruled xix. yeeres. In the viii. yeere of his raigne, Iulius Caesar comming vnto that part where Caleis and Boloign now stand, determined to make warre into Brytaine, which vntill that time remained infrequented and unknowne of the Romanes. His quarrell was, because that in the warres of France, he persecuted the Frenchmen to haue much succour and aide from thence: And because hee could not vnderstand nor learne the greatnesse or state of the Island, neither what Nations they were which inhabited the same, nor what lawes, customes, or kinde of gouernment they vsed, nor yet what Hauens they had able to receiue any number of shippes, he sent Caius Volusenus before with a galley, to discover as much as he coude, concerning those matters, who within fise daies after returned to Caesar, declaring such things as he had learned by coasting alongst the Shore, for he durst not for feare of the Brytains stirre out of his galley. In the meane space the reame Embassadors from many Cities of the Isle, and deliuered him Hostages, with whome hee sent Comius of Arras, charging him to exhort and perswade the rest of the Cities and Counties to do the like. And he himselfe shortly after hauing prepared lxxx. ships, sailed into Brytaine, where at the first being wearied with an hard and sharp battaile, and after with sodain tempest his navy almost destroyed, he returned again into France, there to winter his men.

In the meane space Scæua, one of Caesars souldiers, with foure others, who before in a small vessell were conueied to a rocke nere the Isle, and by ebbing of the Ocean being forsaken, a great number of Brytains fell on a few Romans, and some of his companions (though but few) found meanes to returne by boate, but Scæua remained without feare in the middlest of his enemies darts: And with his speare he resisted them, after with his sword he alone fought against many of them, and when he was both weary and wounded, and had lost his helmet and shield, with two light harnesses, he ran to Caesars tents, and asked pardon of the Emperour for his overboldnesse, who not onely forgave him, but honoured him with the office of a Centurion. Cæsars Com- mentaries. Cassibelanus with a great multitude of people was keeping the bankes, who had set all the sayd bankes, and all the shallowe places, vnder the water with sharpe stakes, euery one of them as bigge as a mans thygh, bound about with lead, & byuen so fast into the bottome of the riuer, that they can neuer be removed, (so sayth Bede and Asker) who affirme that in their times the saide stakes were easily perceiued to remaine as aforesaid. But Cassibelanus and his Byttaines not being able to resist the violence and force of the Romanes, hid themselves in woodes, and with sodaine eruptions of tentimes invaded them: but in the meane time, the Trinobants, which is the strongest Citie welneere of all those contries submitted it selfe, and deliuered hostages to Cæsar, who at their request placed Mandubratius to bee their gouernour, whose father called Immanentius, being chiefe Lord or ruler of the Trinobants, Cassibelane had before slaine, wherewith Mandubratius fled, and comming to Cæsar, not only submitted himselfe, but also was a great meanes (as manie do write) for Cæsar to subdue the rest: yet did Cassibelane send messengers to the foure kinges that ruled in the quarters of Kent, that with all their puissance they shoulde set on the Romans that late hurt them: their names were Cingetorex, Carilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, who obeying his request were discomfited, and Cingetorex taken, wherewithall Cassibelane being dismayed after manie losses, was constrained to giue pledges, and to agree that Bytaine shoulde become tributarie to the Romans. Thus Bytaine became tributarie to the Romanes, the yere of y world 3913. after the building of Rome 698. before Christs birth 3.

Cæsars Com- mentaries, touching the barbaricallnes of Bytaines.

Cæsar in his Commentaries describeth the Bytains thus. The inner part (saith he) is inhabited of such, as by witness of their ancient Records were born and bred in the Ile, and the sea coast by such as haue passed thither out of Belgike to fetch booties, and to make war. All the which welneere, are called by the names of the Cities where they were borne, and from whence they first came, remaining there still when the warre was done, and tilling the ground. The country is marackiously well replenished with people, and there be very many buildings, almost like in fashion to the building of Gallia. There is great store of cattell. The coine they vse is either of brasse, or else ringes of yron filed at a certaine weight in stead of money. In the inner parts of the Realme groweth tinne: and in the sea coast groweth yron, but hereof is small store. The brasse that they occupy is brought in from beyond the sea. There is timber of all kinds as in Gallia, sauing beech and firre. They thinke it a hainous matter to taste of a hare, a henne, or a gosse: neuerthelesse they cherish them for their pleasure. The aire is more temperate in those places then in France, & the colde lesser.

Of all the inhabitants of this Ile, the civillest are the Kentishfolke, the which Country marcheth altogether upon the sea, and differeth not greatly from the manner of France. Those that dwell more into the hart of the Realme, for the most part sowe no cozne, but live by milke and flesh, and clothe themselves in lether. All the Byptaines doe die themselves with woad, which setteth a blewish colour upon them, and it maketh them more terrible to beholde in battaile. They weare their haire long, and haue all parts of their bodies sauing y head and the upper lippe. They haue x. or xii. twines a peece, common among themselves, specially brothers with brothers, and parents with their children, but the issue that cometh of them, is accounted his that first married the mother when she was a maide, &c.

Theomantius the sonne of Lud, and nephew to Cassibelane, succeeded in the Realme of Byptaine, and reigned quietlie xxiij. yeeres, paying the tribute to the Romans which Cassibelane had granted.

Octavius Augustus desiring to bee like Iulius Caesar his father (for so he alwaies termed him) prepared an expedition into Byptain, but being come forward into France, understanding that the Pannonians lately subdued, rebelled, he turned his power against them, and altered his minde as touching our Countrey.

The fourth yeere after, hee opened the Temple of Ianus at Rome, fullie determining to invade Byptaine, but when he had marched on his way, as far as Ariminum, Ambassadors of Byptaine met him, humbly suing for peace, and submitting themselves unto his obedience and protection. Wherefore he stayed againe to settle some troubles then raised in France.

The yeere following, because the covenants betwene him and the Byptains could not be agreed upon, hee made provision for a third expedition into this Ile, but an actuall rebellion in Wiscay and Sauoy withheld him then also. But shortly after Ambassadors came from Byptaine to Rome, intreating for peace, swearing fealtie in the Temple of Mars, offering giftes in the Capitoll to the Gods of the Romanes: and submitted part of the Ile unto Augustus. Now the Byptaines began first to paie tolles and tribute without grudging, for all wares which they traded, which were for that time, Quorie bores, tongues, otches, and other trinkets of Amber and Glasse. And all here were so quiet, that one band of soldiers and a few horsemen, were sufficient to keepe the Ile in the Romane possession.

Cynobelinus, for so is the inscription of his coine, which I haue scene, and read, and therefore corruptly called Kymbeline, the sonne of Theomantius reigned king in Byptaine xxx. yeeres. In the xliij. yeere of his raigne Christ our saviour was bozne in Bethleheim of Juda.

Wherefore Tyberius the Emperour purposed to come hither in person, but death prevented him. Guiderius reigned xliiii. yeres. Ath the Brittain historie doth here place Aruiragus, yet it is probable that Cunobelinus as yet lived, for about 40. yeres after Christ, Admimus the son of Cunobeline banished out of Brittain by his father, was receiued into protection by Caius Caligula the fourth Emperour, who was then set forwarde with great preparation against Brittain, but when he came into the partes of Holland against Norfolk he staied, writing vaunting letters to the Senate, that all Brittain was yielded unto him, because Admimus had so done. Afterward as though he would immediately fight a field, he cast his men into battels and squadrons upon the sea coast, disposing all his Engines in most warlike manner (no man knowing what he meant) this done, he himselfe in a Galley launched into the sea, and immediately returning, he caused the Trumpets to sound to battaile, and sodainelie commaunded them to gather Cockles and Pusle shells, and the rebwith to fill their helmets, saying, they were spoyles due to the Capitoll, and in these spoyles he greatlie triumphed, as though he had subdued the Ocean. He rewarded his souldiours and returned to Rome, after he had built a high watch Tower in token of his victory against the sea, & ruines wherof are great remaining in Holland, but ouerflowed by the water, & to this day called St Brytons house, in remembrance of this ridiculous expedition against Brittain, by the perswasion of Bericus banished out of Brittain.

Claudius the Emperour dispatched Aulus Plancius with an armie into Brittain, where after diuers conflicts when he had receiued part of the Boduni into his tuition, and had slaine Cataracus and Togodumus sons of Cunobeline, and thereby had made the Brytains more eager to reuenge, he sent for Claudius himselfe, who with great preparation and Elephants came into Brittain to his army, then incamped neere the Thames, with which he passed over into Essex, fought with the Brytaines, obtained the victorie, took the chiefe chiefe of Cunobeline, and all weapons from the Brytaines, and so returned to Rome the sixth moneth after hee set forth from thence, where hee triumphed, surmounting his sonne Brytanicus; to which triumph hee permitted not onelie

the presidentes of prouinces, but also certaine banished prisoners to repaire to Rome: and amidst the spoiles taken from the Bytaines, he fired on the top of his pallace a crowne of gold beset with gemmes and forepartes of shippes, in token he had vanquished the Bytish Ocean. He behaued himselfe very courteously towards diuers of his friends, in so much that when Plancius (a notable man) who in his boyage which he made into Bytain, atchieued diuers notable acts, and should triumph for the same, the Emperoz himselfe accompanied him, and (the use being such that with his triumph hee should go vp into the Capitoll) Claudius gaue him the preheminence, and went on the left hand.

At this time Vespasian who was after Emperoz, was sent by Claudius into Bytaine, where he fought 30. times with the Bytaines, subdued to the Roman Empire two worthy nations, aboue 20. towne, and the Ile of Wight.

Ostorius was appointed lieutenant in Bytaine for the Romanes, who at his first entry in the beginning of Winter assaileth the Bytaines, & purposeth to pen them by and include them with riuers & fortifications, wherefore the Iceni made an insurrection, which when he had pacified with some slaughter, he marched against the Gangi, foraging al the countries as he passed, but was forced by new tumults to turne from thē against y Brigants, whome with some slaughter, and promise of pardon, he pacified. Then he made prouision against the Silures which inhabited Southwales, bearing themselves bolde vpon the puissance of Caratacus a valiant Bytaine, who being skilfull of the Countrey, remoued the war into Shropshire, where he fortified amongst craggie mountaines a place strong by situation, where neuertheless the Romans prevailed. The wife, daughter, and brethren of Caratacus were taken, & he flying to Carlismandua a D. ruling in Powleshire, was by her peliuered captiue to his enemies, i.e. yeres after the wars began, who sending him to Rome, was there in open assemblie brought before Claudius, with his wife, daughter, brethren, and friends, and such spoiles as he had been taken from him, where hee (nothing dismayed in spirit or countenance,) spake after this sort to Claudius.

If my moderation of prosperous successes had bene correspondent to my state and nobilitie, I might haue come to this Citie, rather a friend then a captiue: neither you haue disdained to admit me into league, being descended of noble parentage, & soueraine ouer many nations. This present state of mine, as it is villanous toward me, so it is honorable to you. I had horse, men, money, munition, and what wonder is there, If I had lost them but willingly: for if you will rule and raigne ouer all, of necessity all must come into slavery: if I had yielded at the first, neither my fortune nor thy glory had bin renowned, and the obliuion of me had ensued immediately after my execution: but if you save my life, it shall be an everlasting example of your clemency. At these words Claudius remitted his offence, granted him life, & the Senate aduindged Ostorius worthy to triumph: but in the meane time y inhabitants of South-wales to reuenge Caratacus captiuitie intercepted and discomfited certaine bands of the Romans, amidst which new wars, Ostorius tired with trauel, departed this life.

Claudius sent Didius to supply the place of Ostorius now departed, but in the meane time the Silures fought fortunately against the legions which was was vnder the conduct of Manlius Valens. In this time warre brake out betwene Cartimanda Q. of the Brigantes, and Venutius her husband, whome she refused, and matched her selfe with Velocatus his Esquire: whereupon Venutius fauored of the people, assailed her territory, and she succoured by the Romans, after she had intercepted by treachery Venutius brother and allies, fought with him. Where after a sharpe fight, she by the aid of the Romans, prevailed, as also Cæsius Nasica did with his legion against the Brytains in another place: for Didius vsed others in these matters, because he was aged, and onely kept that which others had heretofore conquered.

61 Claudius being now poisoned by Agrippina his wife, Nero her sonne obtained the Romane Empire, and about the 7. yeere of his raigne Verennus was appointed lieutenant here, who died within the first yeere of his government, saying that hee woulde haue subdued prouinces, had he suruiued but two yeeres, but about this time great slaughter was here of the Romans.

62 Suetonius Paulinus was then sent hither, who at his arriuall purposing to subdue Anglesey, whither many Brytains had withdrawne themselves, hee in vessels with flat keeles ferried ouer his footmen, bringing ouer his horsemen by some foulds, whereas on the shores stood closely together great numbers of Brytans, and among them women gadding vp and downe frantically in mourning wædes, their haire hanging about their eares, and shaking firebrands: the Draydes also casting vp their hands towards heauen thundred out cruell exclamations, with which vncomely sights the Romans at first stood dismayed, but after encouraged by the Generals perswasion, they bust in among them, made great slaughter, got the possession of the Isle, and felled downe the woods consecrated to superstitious vses: two cities belonging to the Romans were taken, 80000. of their people slaine, and the whole Island revolted, and to the Romans reproch, the slaughter was committed by a woman, being foretold then by many strange signes & tokens. For in the court was heard a noyse with much slaughter. In the Theatre a great tumult and much wondring, when there was no man there, that either spake or mourned. Besides, in the ruines of Chames certain houses or buildinges were seene. The Image of the goddesse Victoria in the Temple of Camulodunum (which is Maldon in Essex as W. Camden writeth) turned her backe as though she had yielded to her enemies: the women ranne as mad here and there, saying, and singing, Destruction is at hand.

Finally, betwixt the Island and France, the Ocean sea appeared as it flowed with blood. The occasion of this warre was a confiscation of the Brytans gods, which being remitted by Claudius the Emperour, Decianus Catus their Procurator of the Isle, said that it ought to haue bene reuered. To this cause was added, that whereas against their wils Seneca had lent them forty Sellenes vpon great vsurie) he now with great force and all kind of violence compelled them to pay all the whole summe at one payment, and also perswaded them to make warre on the Romans.

Bunduica of Brytaine, a woman of noble birth, not onely with much honour ruled amongst them, but also was the soueraigne in their wars, and had in

in deed a stomacke more manly then womanlike: who hauing gotten together an army of 120000. men, got her vpon her seat made of Parish turnes, after the manner of the Romanes, and being a tall woman, of comely shape, and serene countenance, sharpe voice, with yellowe haire hanging downe to her shoulteres, (Ponticus Virunius saith to her thighs) she ware a great chaine of golde, and had on her backe a coate of sundrie colours, and a platted kirtle. When she was thus apparelled, and had in her handes a great speare, she spake vnto them to this effect.

Ponticus Virunius.

First she commended libertie, shewing them how pouertie with libertie, was farre better then great riches in miserie and bondage: on the other side, with great eloquence she declared the mischiefes and calamities they suffered at the handes of the Romanes, who exacting Tributes of payments, so oppressed them, that much better it were once to die, then long to liue in such extreme slaueerie.

Secondly she reproued them, for not expelling their enemies, as their forefathers had done Iulius Caesar, Claudius and Caligula: And againe she prayed for their present readines to helpe her, and recover their ancient state.

Thirdly, she disabled the Romanes, for that they were fewe, combred with armour, and so faint of courage, that they had rather fight a farre off, then encounter with them by hand strokes: she commended the Bytanes, to be more in number, of greater valour, and farre more able to abide hunger, cold, thirst, raine, winde, heat, &c. she added the vantage of the place, as being at home, where the woods and riuers, lakes, and all other things were well knowne to euerie one of them.

Lastly, she exhorted them to shew themselves as Dogs and wolues among fearefull Hares and Foxes: wherewithall, she let out of her lap a quicke Hare, thereby to learne the euent of her enterprize. The Hare hauing a prosperous passage, all the multitude gaue a great shout, and Bunduica clapping her hands, gaue thanks to her Gods, that she ruled not the Romanes, as did Nero, (who though he were a man, yet was in deede but a woman, for that he sang and plaid on the Harpe) but the Bytains, who esteemed it better to be Warriors then Ploughmen, who, as they had all things in common, so had they both wiues and children, and that hauing a kingdome amongst such a kinde of people, she praised their diuine aides against a spitefull and wicked kinde of men, if they were to be called men, who vsed hote bathes, dainty fare, wine, ointments, lay in soft beds, and were vassals to such a wanton Prince as their Emperour Nero was.

That the Bytans were gentle.

Akinnesse of the Romanes.

Bunduica hauing spoken these and such like amongst her people, withall her hoste she set forward against the Romanes, who at that time were without head or gouernor, for that Paulinus was gone with his armie into Anglesey, (as is before rehearsed,) which is an Island nere Bytaine, by meanes whereof Bunduica toke two of their Cities, and committed the notable slaughter before remembred.

She exercised all kinde of crueltie on such men as she toke. As for the noble women that she gate, she hanged them vp, and cut off their pappes, and sewed them to their mouthes: besides this, the stretching their bodles out at length, thrust sharpe stakes cleane through them: all which thinges were done in despight, when they sacrificed and seased in their Temples, but specially in the wood called Andates.

Paulinus, who had now subdued Anglesey, hearing of the foresaid slaughter, returned to Brytaine, yet would he not adventure the fortune of battaile with them, fearing their number, but when he wanted bravaill, and that his enemies approached, he was compelled to abide the battell. Bunduica, who had in her army 230000. men, was her selfe placed in a Chariot, and ordered her men at length: but Paulinus could not stretch his companie so long, for that they were not of ante such number; but at length he deuised his armie into three partes, so that at one time they might fight in sundry places, exhorting them not to be abashed at the multitude of their enemies, for both they and their forefathers, had with lesse number atchieued greater matters, and gotten greater victories. Adding, that now was the time to plaie the men, to enjoy that in quiet, which before their ancestors had won, and recover that which they had lost, or else to liue for euer in miserie and shame. Again, he shewed what crueltie their eses had scene, by those barbarous people, to such as they had ouercome, exhorting them in reuenge thereof to fight manfully, and there was no doubt but the Gods (who were alwaies fauourable to such as had suffered cruelty) would helpe them: and better it were to die fighting valiantly, then with reproch to be taken, and die in their enemies hands like dogges. Finally (saith he) whether we liue or die, Brytaine shall bee ours; for, though the other Romanes lose it, yet shall our bones continually keepe it. When he had thus spoken, the signe of the battell was giuen, and each part prepareth himselfe: the Brytains with great and strange noise, the Romans in silence came so nere, that they might throwe their dartes to them: and perceluing their enemies to approach, with great violence, rushed in amongst them, and brake their aray: but after being compassed with the multitude of their enemies, the battell waxed doubtfull. The light harnessed men began to smite each other, and those of beaute armour together with the horsemen encountred, and the Roman Archers fought against the Brytish Chariots. They which fought without breastplates, were slaine with Darts. This encounter was made in three severall places, and was fought with great courage on both sides. At the last the Romans departed Conquerors, many were slaine in the battaile, and many were taken. Great numbers which escaped, prepared to fight againe, but in the meane space Bunduica died of a disease which shee had, and they mourned, and buried her verie honourably. After those that remained were callic ouercome and dispersed.

Cornelius Tacitus.

Tacitus saith, that Prasutagus King of the Iceni, a Prince of great wealth, appointed, that Caesar and his owne two daughters should inherite his lands, hereby thinking all his life to be more quiet, and being deceased, his wife and daughters should be the more safer by meanes of such protection: but it fell out farre otherwise, for the Centurions gat his Realme, their seruants spoiled his house, beate his wife, and deflowred his daughters: besides, the chiefest men of

of his land were displaced of their inheritances, and handled extremelie. In reuenge whereof Bunduica raised the warre, and committed the slaughter befoze remembred, and at last her armie once ouerthrowen by Paulinus, being afraid to fall into her enimies hands, she poisoned her selfe.

Policletus then a seruauit of Nero, was sent hither to surueie the state of Byptaine, who discharged Paulinus Suetonius of the gouernement.

Petronius Turpilianus was sent into Byptaine as a man easie to bee entreated, and being not altogether acquainted with offences of the enimies, was the readier to receyue them to grace: who setting matters in their former stay, and attempting no further, deliuered the Province vnto Trebellius Maximus. Trebellius being both faint hearted and too sluggish, and also vtterlie vnacquainted with experientes of armes, ruled by province with a certain mildnes of gouernement. Now had the barbarous people also learned to wincke at inticing vices, and the ciuill warres of the Romanes then happening, was a cloake to his cowardise: but there presentlie arose discord betwene Roscius and Caelius, legates of the xx. legion, when the souldiours (accustomed to be employed in expeditions) gaue themselues to lasciuiousnes: whereupon Trebellius tooke his flight, and hid his head, to auoide the furie of the armie, and in most base and braslie manner, gouerned (as it were) by entreatie, so as they might seeme to haue compounded, that the souldiours should liue in all liberty, and the Generall at his safetie. This time for a yere and halfe there was deadly ciuill warre among the Romanes for the Empire, betwene Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

Vetius Volanus, then was sent hither by Vitellius, he did not vse anie discipline or correction in Byptaine, so as there continued the like slooth and cowardise in the souldiours, toward their enimies, and the Campe still as full of wantonnesse, sauing that Volanus was a good and milde man, and thereby made himselfe beloued where he shoulde haue bene feared. In this time Vitellius aduanced manie souldiours in the Byptaine legions, and Herdonius Flaccus brought vnto him 80000. chosen men of warre out of Byptaine. The Byptaines seeing the Romanes thus encombred with ciuill warre, began to trouble them, wherefoze Volanus would send no succor to Vitellius at his commandement, when Vespasian warred against him for the Empire, and all the Byptaines fauoured Vespasian.

When as (with the rest of the world) Vespasian had recovered Byptaine, then were there placed great Captaynes, and notable armies, the enimies hope abated, and Petilius Cerealis brought great feare vpon the Byptaines. The Citie of the Brigantes (which was accounted one of the greatest of the land) being by him assailed, he hadde many encounters, and some not without slaughter, whereby hee epyther conquered or assailed a great part of their Countrey.

Iulius Frontinus, a man as worthie and ballant as was possible, took then the charge vpon him, and subdued the nation of the Silures, being both ballant and warlike, notwithstanding the valour of the enimie and difficulties of the places.

This was the state of Brytain, and course of the wars, which Agricola found arriving in the middle of Sommer, the souldiers even then beginning to retire to their strengths, and the enemy searching for his most advantage.

The Citty of the Ordoices seldome daies before his arrivall almost wholly defeated a company lying upon their borders. This beginning stirred by the province, serving for an example to them, who coveted the warres, and yet desired to see what was in their new Governour. Agricola, although the Sommer were now well spent, the bandes dispersed all about the province, the souldiers had determined to rest for that yeere, the time being late and inconvenient to commence the war, thinking it would be better to man the places most suspected: yet he determined nevertheless to prevent danger, and gathering together the Standards of the Legions, with a few of his foraine aides, for that the Ordoices durst not take the field, marched forth against them himselfe in the vanguard of his armie, that others might take like courage in the same danger, and put almost that whole nation to the sword: then following his good successe, hee invaded Anglesey, (which Suetonius had before attempted) causing certaine Brytaines that served him, and knewe the shal- lowes and maner of swimming, with horse and harnesse to passe over into the Isle on a sodaine, wherewith the inhabitants were so amazed (who fearing nothing because they sawe no naue) that they submitted the Isle unto him immediately. Now hauing some quietnesse, and perceiving that warre would little preuaile against the Brytaines, if they were insouciously handled, he proposed to cut off all causes of quarrell, and first reforming his own familie, did nothing partially, onely respected the vertue of men, loosened tributes, and behaued himselfe most honourably. And thus much the first yeere.

Tacitus.

When the Sommer began, he assembled his armies, trained his souldiers, foraged the enemies Countries with sodaine inuasions to their great feare, and yet so fauorably, as many Countries willingly yielded unto him, and suffered Castles to be built among them. The Winter following he spent in euill administration, counselling the people privately, and helping them publicly, to build houses, Temples, and Court houses. He procured noble mens children to study liberal Sciences, and then began the Brytaines to conforme themselves to Roman fashions and attyre.

The third yeere he discovered people in the North hitherto unknown, even as far as Tau, terrifying the people, and placing fortresses most wisely to the annoyance of the enemy.

The fourth Sommer he employed getting those Countries which hitherto hee had passed through, euen to Edenborough, Frith, and Cluid, the narrowest space betwene the which waters he fortified.

The fifth yeere by Sea he discovered and vanquished farther nations in the North, and placed garrisons in the coast toward Ireland, wherunto hee also aspired, and to that end retained an Irish Prince with him, that was driven out of his Countrey by ciuill dissention.

But in the Sommer which began the first yeere of his government, he feared the Hauens by a naue for that purpose sent to the Sea, fearing least all those

those nations beyonde had vnited themselves and kept the passages by lande; but after ward he marched forward, his nauie coasting with his army by land, so as sometime in the same Campe, he had horsemen, footemen, and Seamen, lodged together. It was reported by such as were taken prisoners, that the sight of the nauie much astonished the Byptaines as men from whom all refuge was cutte off, the secretes of their Seas being discovered: wherefore determining to trie it with hand blowes the inhabitants of Calidonia with great preparation, although the report thereof were greater (as it often happeneth in vnknown matters,) of their owne accorde, assailed some Castles, and seeing themselves rather to bee assailable then defendantes, put the Romanes in some doubt: whereupon the colwarde pretending pollicie, aduised to retreue on this side Bodotria, rather then to bee diuised there by force, then as in the meane while, Agricola knowing that the enemy would charge him in seuerall troups and companies, and fearing to bee ouermatched and coupled in with number, or decciued by the ignorance of the place, diuided his army into three battels, and so marched forward: which order marked by his enemies, made them alter their purpose, and in the night killing the watch, brake in vpon the ninth legion, halfe a sleepe and halfe affrighted, which (as they took it) was the weakest, and so the fight continued within the Campe till it was day light, at which time the Romanes began to gather courage, and the Byptains were discomfited, so as, had it not bin for the woods and bogges, that victorie had ended the whole strife, after which battell the Roman souldiours grew to be of hauntie courage, crying out to pierce the countrey of Calidonia, that they might finde out the vttermost portes and boundes of Byptaine. The Romanes on the other side, ascribing the praise of this victorie, not to the prowesse of the Roman souldier, but to Fortune and the willnesse of their Captaine, vsed all meanes possible, to hearten vp and arme their youth, bestowing their wiues and children in places of safegard, and by sacrifices and holy assemblies vnite al their Cities together: vpon these resolutions they remoued.

In the beginning of the next sommer which was the viii. yeere of his charge, Agricola sending his fleet before him, which often put a land and spoiled the Countries, thereby causing a great and vncertaine feare: himselfe with a picked army, whereunto he added of the valiantest Byptains, came to the mountaine Grampius, whereon his enemies had encamped, (for the Byptaines nothing quailed by the successe of the former encounter, and expecting nothing but a reuenge, or bondage, learning at length, that common danger is onelie to be resisted with common consent) by leagues and embassages had stirred by the mindes of all the Cities about. Soe were there to be in armes thirtie thousand and vpwarde, vnto which number, the youth, and all such as were of strong and lustie yeeres, euerie man bearing his tokens of praise about him, continually repayed from all sides. When amongst many other Captains, Calgacus a man both in nobilitie and valor aboue the rest, spake to the assembly in this manner: As of ten as I behold the causes of this warre and our necessitie, my minde giueth me great hope, that this day and your mutuall consent shall be the beginning of libertie to all Bypaine; for, every one of you hauing tried seruitude, and hauing no other land nor sea, which can saue vs (the Romanes name being at our elbowes) the verie warre and weapons which are the honour of the worthish, must be the onlie safete of the faint-hearted.

 With these and manie such reasons drawne from the calamitie of their future seruitude, the pride and tyrannie of their gouernors, the sickle friendship of the strangers seruing in their enemies campe, ready to change vpon any high occasion, and the present remedie of al misery, which, as he said in the beginning, was onely baliaunce, he so stirred vp all mens minds, that they applauded his Oracion after their manner, with songs and diuers kind of noises. His Oration being ended, as also Agricola his speech to his Souldiours, the two armies beganne to encounter. Agricola placed his battailes in this order: hee made his maine battaile of the strangers (his aides) which were in number viii. thousand, on each side thereof, for wings he placed his horsemen to the number of three thousand, and his legions he caused to garde the trenches of his Campe, that if it were possible, the victorie might be gained without the shedding of Roman bloud, or if his main battaile were broken, they might be gathered againe, and the fight restored by his legions. The battaile of the Byptaines (to terrifie their enemies, as also to make their brauest thewe,) stood ou-higher ground, so as their baluarde being come vpon the plaine, the rest were on the fote of the hill, their Chariots, in the meane time gallopping by and dooing the felde, making great howles and cries. When Agricola perceiuing the number of his enemies to bee greater then his owne, and fearing to bee charged both on the face and flanke of his battaile at one time, and that manie thought necessarie to haue the legions advanced forwarde, remained notwithstanding firme in his first resolution, causing his battaile to bee somewhat drawne in length, himselfe alighted from his horse, and stood on fote before his standards. The first fight was with shotte of arrowes and dartes, during which time, the Bypaines, both skilfullie and couragiouslie with their huge Swords and small Bucklers, either bare or brake the Romanes shotte, and answered them with an infinite number of the like, untill Agricola was perswaded by bands of Hollanders, and Brabanders, that the matter might be brought to swords and hand-strokes, which kinde of fight they were acquainted withall, by long haunting the wars, and the same was verie incommo-dious for their enemies, bearing but small shielde, and vnumcassurable swordes:
 For the pointlesse swordes of the Bypains, were unfit for a strong, and where they wanted come. Wherefore the Hollanders strake thicke together, and thrust them ouer the Bucklers, wounding them in the faces, and hauing broken that battaile, passed forward towarde them which kept the hill, which scene by the rest of the Romanes bandes, they partly moued by enuie of the others glorie, and partly by heate of their owne courages, cutte in pieces those that they first encountred, leaueing notwithstanding, some halfe dead, and others not touched, for haste to obtaine a perfect victorie. In the meane while, the troupes of the Bypaine horsemen, did take their flight, but the

of fight, (at first) seemed somewhat terrible to their enemies, but it long served not their turnes, being assailed with a thicke pzeale of their enemies, and the ground not commodious for the Chariots, nor their riders all of the best. So as at the last, their Chariot horses, coursing vp and downe the felde without guiders, ouertanne many of their owne companie, as they fled for feare from one place to another. The Byptaines, which all this while kept the hill, and came not to the fight, making little reckoning of the small number of the Romanes, beganne by little and little to descend, intending to hemme them in, in the midst of their conquest, which surely they had done, if Agricola, suspecting the same, had not dispatched foure companies of horsemen (which he kept for all sodaines) to encounter with them, who, the more fiercely they assailed, so much the more sharply repulsed them, and sent them to flight: whereupon the deuice of the Byptaines turned to their owne harme. Moreover, by Agricola his commandement the winges of the horsemen were taken from the front of his battell, and were made to charge vpon the battell of his enemies, standing ouer-against them. Then might you behold in the open felde, a greiuous and lamentable spectacle, some followed the chase, some took prisoners, and after killed them to take others. Some the enemies as euerie one thought best, fledde, some in heapes and armed fled from a smaller number: other, though vnarmed, farrped and were slaine: euerie where laie weapons, carcases, and limbs cut off, the ground all bloudie. Sometime the vanquished appoaching neare to Woods, would make head, and entrappe the hedelesse followers, so as, if Agricola had not caused certaine lustie bandes in the manner of a search, and also diuers horsemen, leauing their horse where the Woods were thicke, and other on horsebacke, where the Woods would suffer, to raunge them all about, there might haue bene some betrimment receiued by too much hardinesse. But when the Byptaines saw themselves pursued in order of battaile, they took againe their flight, not in companies as before, nor tarrying one for another, but here and there, euen as men glad to escape, sought long and by wales. Flight and wearinesse of slaughter ended the chase. There were slaine of the Byptaines about tenne thousand: of the Romane armie, thre hundred and fortie, among whom Aulus Accius, Captaine of a bande, whome the heate of his youth, and courage of his horse brought into the hands of his enemies. That night the victors made merrie with the spoile, but the Byptaines wandring vp and downe, men and women lamenting together, relieved and fetcht away their hurt men, assembled together the whole, forsooke their houses, and for anger set fire on them, choosing themselves lurking places, which straight they forsooke againe: some time conceiuing good hope, which straightway quapled againe: and some were knownen to kill their wiues and children, as though they had therein taken compassion vpon them. The next day made the victorie more manifest, in which there was nothing but silence, the hills being then forsaken, and also the houses smoking a farre off.

Agricola sending abroad his espialles, coulde finde no enemy to make head, wherefore Sommer being too farre spent to procede any further in the warre, warre, hee had his souldiours into the coastes of the Horesti, and there taking hostages, caused his naute to coaste about Bytaine, which at last arrived at the Haven called Trutulensis, afterwarde having bestowed his souldiours in their wintering places, departed Bytaine, and left the prouince in quiet to his succellour.

First Christians in Bytaine.
Nicephorus.

Diuers authors affirme, that about this time, the Gospell of Christ our saviour was first preached in this Iland. Nicephorus a Greeke author in his second booke the 40. Chapter, hath as followeth. Simon bozne in Cana Galilei, who for his seruent affection to his Master, & great zeale be toke by all means to the Gospell, was surnamed Zelotes, he hauing receiued the holy Ghost from aboue, traualled through Aegypt and Affrike, then through Mauritanis and all Lybia, preaching the Gospell. And the same Doctrine he brought to the Occidentall sea, and the Isles called Brytania, &c. And in the third Booke the first Chapter, he saith. The holie Apostles (like as we haue declared already) being dispersed throughout the whole earth, did diuide the prouinces amongst them by lot, to preach the Gospell in. Peter undoubtedly first at Jerusalem, then in Galatia, Bythinia, with the higher Asia, Cappadocia, and all Italie, taught the Gospell: Iohn in Asia, who ended his life there: To Andrew fell the prouinces on the coaste of Eurine, all Scythia, Byzans, Macedonia, and the firme land of Greece: Thomas amongst the Parthians, Indians, and the Ile of Taprobana did publish the Gospell: Another chose Aegypt and Lybia: another the bittermost coastes of the Ocean, with the Isles of Bytaine, &c.

Dorotheus.

Dorotheus writeth thus. Simon Zelotes passing through Mauritanis, and Affrica preached Christ, at length was crucified, slaine and buried in Bytaine, or rather Bythania. Also he saith, Aristobulus, whom the Apostle to the Romans remembereth, was made a Bishop in Bytaine or Bythania. George Maior writeth in a preface, that immediatlie after Christs resurrection vnder Claudius the Emperour, the light of the gospel was kindled in Bytaine by Ioseph of Arimathea that buried the body of Christ. Tertullian writting against the Iewes of those times, saith: The Bytaines inhabitants of places vnknownen to the Romanes, yet did obey and were subiect to the kingdome of Christ. William of Malmesbury, in his booke of the antiquities of Glasseburie, alleageth Freculphus to write in his second booke and fourth Chapter, as followeth: Philip the Apostle, preaching the worde of God in Gaule (nowe called Fraunce) chose out xli. amongst his Disciples, whome hee sent into Bytaine to preach the worde of life, and vpon euerie one of them, he most deuoutly stretched out his right hande: ouer these he appointed for chiefe, his deare friende Ioseph of Arimathea, that buried our Lorde. These (saith Iohn Capgrau, who alleageth Melkin and Merlin) came into this lande the yere of Christs incarnation sixtie thre, in the time of Aruiragus who gaue to them the Ile of Aualon, where they builded an Oratorie of wythen wodes, and after there were buried: which place being since encreased, and newly builded by diuers Princes, was named Glasseburie. For confirmation thereof, King Henry the second (as himselfe in his Charter affirmeth) hauing diligentlie perused the Priviledges and Charters, which hee caused to be presented and read, us King of Brytaine.

Lib. Concli. Lon.

Psalm. 45.

The yere after Christs birth 202. Pope Elutherius did write to Lucius king of Brytain, for the amendment of the kings and the nobility of Brytain as followeth. You required that we should send you the Roman and Imperia-ll lawes, y you might vse the in your kingdome of Brytain, but those lawes we may disproue, & not the lawes of God. You haue receiued lately through Gods godnesse in your kingdome, the faith and law of Christ, you haue there in your kingdome both Testaments, out of them by Gods grace, and the aduice of your realme take a lawe, and there by patiently gouerne the kingdome. You are the Vicar of God in your kingdome, according to the kingly Prophet. The earth is the Lordes, and his fulnesse is the whole worlde, and all that dwell therein: and againe, Thou hast loued righteousnesse, and hated iniquitie, therefore God (euen thy God) hath annointed thee with the oyle of gladnesse aboue thy fellowes. They are the kings children, christian nations, and people of your kingdome that line and consist vnder your protection, peace, and kingdome according to the Scripture, as an Hen gathereth her chickens vnder her wings, the people, and nations of the kingdome of Brytaine is yours, such as are diuided you should gather them together to the lawe of Christ: his holy Church, to peace and con corde: and cherish, maintaine, protect, gouerne, and defend them from the insurious, malicious and their enemies. Woe be to that kingdome,

kingdome, the King whereof is a childe, and the Princes eate early in the morning. I doe not call a King a childe for his youth or minozitie, but for his folie, iniquitie, and madnesse, according to the Kingly Prophet. The bloud-thirstie and deceitfull men shall not outlive halfe their daies. By eating we shall understand Gluttonie; by Gluttonie Lurarie; by Lurarie, all filth, wickednesse and mischief, according to King Salomon: Wisedome will not enter into a spitefull soule, nor inhabite in a bodie subiect to Sinne. A King hath his name of governing, and not of his kingdome, so long you shall be a King, as you rule well, otherwise, you shall not bee so named, and lose that name, which God forbids. God graunt that you may so rule your Realme of Byttain, that you may reigne with him everlastingly, whose Vicar you are in the saide kingdome. To whom with the father, &c.

There remaineth in the Church of Saint Peter vpon Cornhill at London, a Table, wherein is written, that Lucius founded the same Church to bee an Archbishops see, and made it the Metropolitane and chiefe Church of his kingdome, which so endured the space of 400. yeres, vnto the comming of Saint Augustine.

The Archbishops names, I finde onely to be set downe by Iocelyn of Furne, in his booke of Bytish Byshops, and not else where. Iocelyn of Furne.

1 Thean (lastly he) was the first Archbishop of London, in the time of Lucius, who builded the saide Church of S. Peter in a place called Cornhill in London, by the aide of Ciran, chiefe butler to King Lucius.

2 Euanus was the second, and he builded a Librarie to the same Church adioyning: and converted manie of the Druides (learned men in the Pagans lawe) to the Christian faith.

3 Cadar was the thirde.

Thus much out of Iocelyn of the Archbishops: the credit whereof I leane to the iudgement of the learned: for I read of a Bishop of London (not before named) in the yere of Christ, 326. to be present at the second Councell holden at Arlas, in the time of Constantine the Great, who subscribed thereunto in these wordes: Ex prouincia Britania ciuitate Londinenſi Reſtitutus Epiſcopus: as plainlie appeareth in the first Tome of the Councelles. He writeth not him selfe Archbishop, and therefore maketh that matter of Archbishops doubtful, or rather overthroweth that opinion.

Lucius reigned xii. yeres, and was buried at Clocester.

Comodus after his father Antonius Philosophus succeeded in the Empire with most cruell tyrannie. In his time the Northern Bytaines burst in through the wall, forayed the Countrey, and slew the Romane General with his souldiers, wherefore Vlpus Marcellus was appointed here a carefull vigilant Captaine: he soze annoied the Bytaines, which were enemies to the Roman state, and purchasing enuie by his vertue, was shortly dismissed.

Lampridius
Dion.

Then Ceronnis who ruled all vnder Comodus, appointed certaine men of base estate to gouerne the Romane enemies here, therewith the souldiours being grieved, sent 15000. chosen men out of their number to Rome, who accusing him before Comodus to compasse the Empire, for his sonne, was deliuered vnto them, who immediately mangled him and slew his wife with his two sonnes.

Lampridius.

Comodus then sent Holnius Pertinax into Bytaine, and surnamed himselfe Brytanicus thereunto perswaded by flatterers, when the Bytaines were so euill affected toward him, that they would haue nominated some other Emperour against him, and namely Pertinax: but these tumults were appeased by the wisdom of Pertinax, to his great danger, for he was well nere slaine in tumult, and left among the dead, which insury he after seuerally reuenged, and sued for his discharge, being after ward preferred to the Empire.

Ca. irolinus.

Capitolinus.

Clodius Albinus was then sent hither by Comodus, who at the first so greatly esteemed of him, that he honored him with the title of a Caesar, which Clodius refused: but afterwards when a false rumor was dispersed, that Comodus was slaine, hee made an Oration to the legions of Bytaine, impeaching the gouernment of Emperours, and preferring the Senate, whereupon Comodus being charned against him, sent Iunius Seuerus to rule here, and shortly after Comodus was slaine.

Pertinax then was chosen Emperour, and within iii. monethes was slaine through the perswasions of Didius Iulianus, who enioyed the Empire two monethes, and the practise of Clodius Albinus, which then returned into Bytain, and (as it seemeth) recovered his former gouernment.

194

Seuerus after the death of Pertinax was saluted Emperour: he immediately slew Didius Iulianus, and because he feared Clodius Albinus with his Bytaine legions, he created him Caesar, and partaker of the Empire, and sent Heraclius to gouerne this Isle: but after he had subdued Niger who also usurped the Empire, he moued warre against Albinus, who passing hence into France with the Bytish armie, encountered with Seuerus neare Lions, and was there slaine. Henceforth Seuerus quietly enioyed the Romane Empire, and made sharpe warres into the Gallerne partes of the world, with great glorie.

But returning to Rome, he vnder stood of a war raised in Bytaine. Wherefore he hasted hither with his two sonnes Balsianus and Gera: at his arrivall peace was offered, which he refused, and leaning his yonger sonne Gera to gouerne the prouince, (being the hither part of the Isle) he with Balsianus his eldest sonne entred into the North, & passed the further part of this Ile and without any resistance: yet by ambushes, difficultie of the waie, and other inconueniencies, ences, he lost 50000. men, and then returned, enforced the enemies to conclude a league, and yeld some part of their Countrey.

At conclusion of which league, when hee and his sonne rid to treat with the Caledonians or Fortherne Byptaines, Bassianus his sonne drawing his sword in the sight of the enemy, was ready to haue slaine him, and had done it, had not some of the companie made an outcrie: yet this fault was remitted.

After this league, the Byptaines of the North resorted to the Emperours Court, where Iulia, Seuerus wife, objected to a woman of Byptaine, the wife of Argentorix the Caledonian, that the Byptish women accompanied with men dishonestly: yea quoth the Byptish woman, wee satisfie the naturall lust in better sort then you Romanes, for wee accompanie our selues openly with the best men, and you commit adulterie closely with the most vile persons. But after this league there was a generall reuolte of the Byptaines against the Romanes, which yet was pacified with great slaughter, and then hee built a wall of turfe, to inhibit the Fortherne Byptaines, from whence then hee returned, at the next lodging, a blacke Horse that serued him, a notable scoffer, met him with a Crowne of Cyprus: he moued with the colour of the man, and the Cyprus (which was then vsed at all burials,) as with signes of euill lucke, commanded the man to be sent awate, wherewith he cried: Thou hast bene all in all, and hast vanquished all, and now of a Conqueror be thou a God. Then coming to the Citie of Pozke (as is supposed,) he was by mistaking brought to the Temple of Bellona: blacke beasts also being ordained for sacrifice, followed him home to his pallace: which things these did then account to be ominous.

Spartianus.

Shortly after he departed out of this life at Pozke, partly through sickness, and partly through griefe conceiued of his sonnes euill demeanour. At his last gaspe he uttered these wordes: I found the state troublesome euerie where, and leaue it quiet euen vnto the Byptaines.

Herodian writeth that in these warres of Seuerus against the North Byptaines, he found their Countrey full of watery Marshes: by those Marshes did the Byptains swim and skirmish with their enemies, being couered with water vnto the Pauell, not caring that men salve the priue parts of their naked bodies. Neither did they know the vse of apparell, but accustomed to compassse their bellies and necks onlie with yron, which they esteemed an ornament and token of riches, as other barbarous people supposed of Golde. They painted their bodies with diuers pictures and formes of beasts, and therefore wore no garment, least the painting should be hidden, being a nation very valiant, and warlike, greedy of slaughter, and content onely with a small target, a speare, and a skin hanging by their naked sides, ignorant of the vse of shirts of maille and helmes, for they reckned the same comberous vnto them, when they should swimme over the lakes, &c.

Herodian.

A grievous disease came vpon Seuerus, being soze appalled with age, so that he was constrained to keepe his chamber and send Antonius vnto the warres: but Antonie not regarding the businesse of Byptaine, endeouored by all means he coule, to win the hearts of the souldiers vnto him, deprauing his brother, to the intent they should onely aide him to the attaining of the soueraigntie. The long maladie of his father, caused him to perswade Iulius to rid the old man out of the world, untill that Seuerus, being consumed, ended his life, who was the most famous of all Emperours in warlike affaires: For none other had obtained so many victories and conquests, either ciuill against his aduersaries, or forraigne against the barbarous nations. Thus deceased hee, after hee had gouerned the Empire the space of xliiii. yeres, leaving his sons for successors in the same: vnto whome he lefte also great abundance of riches, as none of his predecessours had before him done. When Antony had gotten the supreme authoritie, he put to death the Iulians, because they obeyed not his commandement in hastning his fathers death: and slew all his owne and his brothers bringers by and instructors, for that they went about to reconcile them, leaving none aliuie, that was either of dignitie, or had reuerenced his father. The Captaines of the armie hee enticed, to perswade the souldiours to proclaime him onely Emperour: imagining daile manifold mischiefs against his brother: but hee could not win the souldiours good willes. Wherefore Antony, hauing taken truce with the Bytaines, remoued towardes his mother and brother. Their mother laboured to bring them to agreement, wherein also many prudent counsellours earnestly travelled, Antony thereby was induced, rather of force, then good will, to counterfaite lone. After which done, the two brethren gouerning the Empire with equall honour, launched out of Bytaine, and sailed with the reliques of their father toward Rome. For when they had burned the bodie (as was the custome of the Romanes) they carried the ashes, intermedled with pleasant odours, in a Bore of Alabaister to Rome, that it might bee there interred amongst the monuments of other Princes. Themselves led thus their armie, as conquerours of Bytaine, and passed ouer the Ocean vnto the next coast of France, and so halset towards Rome. When they were entred into Rome, all the people crowned with Laurell, receiued, and the Senate welcommed them. For most road the Emperours themselves, clothed in Emperall purple. And next vnto them followed the Consuls bearing the vessell with Seuerus reliques. Which vessell, the people, after they had saluted the new Emperour, did reuerently worship. The Emperours and Consuls being thus accompanied with Princely pompe, caried the same into the Temple, where the diuine monuments of Marcus, and other Emperours are seene. After they had finished the solemne sacrifice, and according to the auncient vsage, celebrated the funerall ceremonies, both the brethren departed into the Emperall pallace: which they deuised betwene them, closed by all backe doores, and priuie passages, and met together only at the outer gates. They chose besides either of them vnto himselfe a sundrie garde, and neuer came together vnlesse it were sometime for a little while to be seene of the people. Nevertheless, first of all, they accomplished the due funerals of their father. For the Romans accustomed to consecrate with immortallitie, such Emperours, as at their death, leane either children, or successors in the Empire behinde them. And those which are endued with that honour, they canonize amongst the Gods. There is through the

the Citie, a certaine dolefull lamentation, mixed with fearefull soie. And they vse to interre the dead corpes verie sumptuously. But then, they haue an Image, made as like the dead Emperoz, as may be. The same, within the porch of the Emperiall Pallace, they laie in a great and high bedde of Iuorie, covered ouer with cloth of golde. The same Image looketh verie pale, like a diseased patient. About the bed on either side, a great part of the daie, do certaine persons sit: that is to wit, on the left side, the Senate, clothed in blacke garments: and on the right side, many matrons. None of these are sene to weare any owtches, or chaines of gold, but being clad with thin white vestures, they shewe the countenance of mourners. And thus doe they continue the space of 7 daies: during the which, enery day the Emperors Physicians do repaire vnto the bedde, and, as though they had felt the patients pulses, declare that hee wareth more sicke then before. Finally, when it seemeth that hee is deceased, certaine of the most noble and worthy young men, of the orders of knightes and Senators, doe take vp the bedde on their shoulders, and carrie it through the streete, called Sacra via, vnto the olde market place, where the Romane Magistrates are accustomed to render by their offices. There on both sides, are certaine stages made with steps, vpon the which, on the one side, is a quire of boies, being noble mens sonnes; and on the other side are many beautifull women, singing hymnes and ballades, in prasse of the dead Emperour, measured with diuers lamentable verses. When these are finished, the young men doe take vp the bed againe, and beare it out of the Citie, into the field called Campus Martius, in the broadest part whereof, there is created a Tower foure square, with sides of equall height builded of great tybber, like vnto a Tabernacle. The same within forth, is filled with vyle chippes and reedes: and on the outer side, it is hanged with freas clothes of golde, and decked with Images of Iuorie, and sundrie painted pictures. Within it also, is an other lesse Towre, but like in forme, with dore and portalles opened. And euer that, the third and fourth, with manie other romes ascending continually, untill they reach vnto the highest, which is lesse then all the other. A man may compare this building vnto Colozes, which are set in Vauens with fire on the toppes, to direct shippes which saile by night on the Seas, into their perfect portes. The same are commonlie called Phari. Now when they haue put the bed in the second Tabernacle, they gather all kinds of spices and perfumes, with diuers odoriferous frutes, hearbes and wyces, the which they throwe on heapes in the tabernacle. Neither is there anie Nation, Citie, or person, which excelleth in honour or dignitie, but at that time will to the uttermost of his power, most honourably celebrate the last funeralles of the Emperour.

When they haue couched a great heape of spices together, and stuffed the building therewith, all the Roman knightes do ride about the Tower, with a iust course and order to and fro: Chariots are also drayne about, wherein manny so fit clothed in purple, representing the persons of al noble men being magistrates and captaines of Rome.

The ceremonies being thoroughly ended, the successor in the Empire, taketh a byand

a band of fire in his hand, and fireth therewith the tabernacle. After whome, all other that are present, do throwe fire likewise into the same. And immediately, all the building being filled with those drie sticks and spices, beginneth to burne vehemently. Then out of the highest and least towre, as out of a high steeple, is let forth an Eagle, the which they beleue, doth beare the Emperours soule into heauen. And from thenceforth is that Emperour worshipped as the other gods.

From this time to the raigne of Dioclesian, for the space of 72. yeeres, there is nothing recorded in our Histories hitherto published concerning Brytaine; but whereas it is manifest that the soueraigntie of Brytaine rested in the Roman Emperours all that space, I will set them here downe successively.

Some sedition was then raised in Brytain and appeased by Victorinus, a boine, by whose motion Probus had made him Regent of Brytaine, which was causer of this trouble. This Probus permitted

the Byztains and others that they might haue vines and make wine. After he had raigned five yeres, he was slaine of the souldiours.

Carus was created Augustus, hee made Carinus and Numerianus his sonnes Cæsars, to which Carinus he assigned Byztaine, Gaule, Illyricum, Italie, and Spaine, but Carus was slaine by lightning, and the other two within thre yeres space lost their liues.

Dioclesian was then chosen Emperour, who adioined Maximianus vnto him in like gouernement.

Carausius was appointed to bee admirall of the Byztaine seas, which were sore troubled by the pirates of the Frankes and Sarons: but when he had oftentimes apprehended the pirates, and neither referued the Prizes, or was accountable for it, neither to the Emperours, nor their deputies, it was suspected, y of set purpose hee permitted those rouers to haue recourse through those seas, to the end hee might risle them, and enrich himselfe. Maximianus therefore sent part of his armie to suppressle him, in which were manie of the Thebane legion, who in this iourney were slaine by his commandement, and made Martires, because they professed Christ. Carausius vnderstanding of the preparation made against him, passed out of Gaule into Byztaine, where byinging the cuntry to his obeyfance, he vsurped the roabe of an Emperour: whereupon they which were sent to surprize him, returned to Maximianus, who then was incumbrd with newe warre in Gaule. In the meane time Carausius built shippes in Byztaine, intercepted certaine companies of souldiours, assembled a great number of barbarous people with spoyle, with hope of whome he purposed to trouble the sea coasts of Gallia and Spaine. Holland also (then holden by certaine Frankes) revolted to Carausius.

Then purposed Maximianus the second time to make warre against Carausius, but by stormy wea ther, and want of Pilotes, he was enforced to defer his purpose. Shortelie after, the two Emperours elected two Cæsars, Valerius Maximus, and Constantius Chlorus, to which Constantius they committed the recovery of Byztaine. He immediatly passing through Gaule hitherward, suddenly surprisid Gessoriacum (now called Bullen) which Carausius had manned, and so stopped the hauen, that it could stand Carausius in no steade. Then building Shippes to passe ouer hither, hee first assayled luckilie the Hollanders, which had revolted to Carausius, and then staying for conuenient winde, hee houerid a while on the sea coast, and in the meane time Carausius was traitterously slaine by Alecdus his familiar friend.

Alecdus then vsurped the empire here in Byztaine, against whom Constantine with his former preparation made readie for warre, and launched out in haste, though the wind was contrarie: which when his souldiers vnderstood, they set out also with side winds out of the same and other portes, in such foggy and misty wea ther, that they passed by Alecdus nauie, then houerid about the Ile of Wight, the one not seeing the other. The Romanes as soone as they landed burnt their Shippes, determining eyther to winne, or lose their liues. Which when Alecdus vnderstode, hee left the shore, and prepared himselfe for battaile with his mercenarie barbarous souldiours, in which hee was slaine by Asclepiodatus Lord great master of the Emperours house. In this fight none of the Romanes perished, but here all the field was ouer spread with dead bodies of the enimies, among whome lay Alectus himselfe without anye Emperfall ornaments, and scantlie knowne. Other Romane souldiours also which had lost their company in the mist, arriued at London, nowe in the Citie a grea number of barbarous people which escaped from the bat taile, and purposed to haue sacked London. Then when Constantius came a land, the Byztaines with their wiues & children flockt vnto him, and submitted theiueselues toisfullie, being now deliuered out of a long thraldome. This expedition of Constantius into Byztaine is ascribed by some to Maximianus, into which error, a false inscription of the Panegyriks hath led them.

Asclepiodatus hauing recovered Byztaine, as is before touched, he belaid the Citie of London with a strong siege (saith Geffrey Monmouth) and ere it were long by knightlie force and violence, entred the Citie, and slew the Romane Captain named Linius Gallus, nere vnto a brooke there at that time running, into the which brooke he threw him, by reason whereof it is called in Bytish Nant Gallion, since in the Saxon tongue Gallus or Wallus brooke, and to this day the stræte where sometime the brooke ran, is called Wallbrooke. The Romane Histories speake nothing of this Gallus, but of Galerius, which was ioined in the empire with Constantius, after the decease of Asclepiodatus, & also of the Bytish king Coill, as that he shewd in place conuenient. True it is I grant, that a certaine brooke, dreined, I knowe not from what heads, but much encreased by the moorish groundes, without the Citie of London on the North side, passed through the same Citie southward to the riuer of Thames. And therefore of coming through and from the wall, and so through the Citie, was since called Wallbrooke: which brooke in olde time had in diuers places, Bridges ouer it, as appeareth by inquisition made in Anno. 1300. Elius Russell being Paio: of London, William Jordane, and I. de Beuer then Paissers of those Bridges founde, who were bound to repaire them so oft as needed, and then was the same brooke vaulted ouer with brick, as it now remaineth.

But to returne to the Romanes: who had now recovered Byztaine within ten yeres after Carausius first toke it. Dioclesian (saith Eusebius) persecuted the Church of God. In the nænetieth yere of his raygne, hee beganne to ouerthrowe the Churches downe to the grounde, yea, and the very foundations were digged vp, the helie and sacred Scriptures burned to ashes in the open market place, the Pastors of the Church were persecuted. When he had raigned together with Maximianus, who persecuted with him xx. yeres, he deposed himselfe voluntarily, and liued a priuate life. From that time to his end he pined away with diseases: but Maximian hanged himselfe.

Of this persecution, Bede hath thus: Dioclesian in the East, and Maximianus in the West, raised the tenth persecution, after Nero, against the Christians, he commaunded the Churches to be spoyled, the Christians to be tommenfed and killed. Which persecution was both longer, and also crueller then all the other: for whole tenne yeres together it continued in burning the Churches, in banishing the innocents, in murdering the Martyres, and neuer ceased. Besides, among other places, it made Brytaine to bee honoured with the glory of manie holie Martyres, which constantly stode and dyed in the confession of their faith. Among other suffered S. Albane, of whome Fortunatus Prisca in the booke he wrote in the praise of Virginitie, speaking of the Martyres, which from all the coasts of the world came vnto God, saith:

The Martyr

S. Alban for professing Christ, beeing led from the Citty of Verolanium, vnto Holmehurst, since called Derswold wood, where now the Colone of S. Albans is builded, suffered martirdome in the yere of Christ 293. who is specified to be the first Martyr of Brytaine: and shortly after to the number of one thousand Christians were martyred at Lichfield, where Amphabele Instructor of Alban was taken, brought to Verolanium, and there tormented, by sitting vpon his belly, whipping him about a stake, winding his bowelles out of his body, and stoning him to death. The life and martyrdome of these two, to wit, of Alban and Amphabele was recorded and written in Latine at large, by one, who wrote himselfe by none other name, then, of all wretches the simplest man: since by Mathew Paris, a Monk of S. Albane, turned out of Latine prose into French verse, both which Bookes I haue seene, and was since translated out of the Latine and French, into English metre by Iohn Lydgate Monk of Burie.

Constantinus beganne his Empire with Galerius, the Empire was diuided betwene them: so that Constantius shoulde possesse Africa, Italie, France and Brytaine: Galerius shoulde haue Illyrica, Asia, and the East parts: which done, they substituted vnder them two Cæsars, Constantius holding himselfe content with the dignity of Augustus, refused to susteine the trouble which he shoulde haue endured through the administration of the affaires of Italy and Afrique: he sought by all meanes howe hee might enrich the people of the Empire. He abolished the superstition of the Gentiles in his dominions, so that after ward Brytaine felt no persecutions. The yere following he passed out of France hither against the Pictes, at which time his sonne Constantine, who then serued Galerius, perceiuing his destruction to be compassed, passed to his father in all haste, houghing and killing all the post horses, which way soeuer he passed, that he might not be pursued, and came to his father the berie houre that he went aboarde to come into Brytaine: but Constantius as soone as hee came to Worke, sodainly sickened, and perceiuing his day to draw neere, when he was asked to whom he would leaue the Empire, answered, to Constantine, and shortly after departed.

Socrates, li. 2. ca. 2

Constantine surnamed the Great, sonne of Constantius borne in Bithinia by Helena, the Inkeper (saith William of Malmesburie) first consecrated, as is aforesaid: his father being now dead, did with so great sorrow, and shedding of teares solemnize his burfall, that the souldiers hoping he would resemble his father, saluted him Emperour at Poike against his will: but at Rome Maxentius the sonne of Maximianus Herculus, is chosen of the Pretorian souldiers, not to gouerne the Empire, but rather to practise tyrannie.

Maximianus being chiefe Emperour, after he had crowned Emperour Licinius, (by originall a Dane, his ould fellow souldier and familiar friend) departed himselfe rather a tyrant then an Emperour, abusing the spouses of noble personages, slaying manie with the sword, and putting in by other such like practises.

Constantine the Emperour, being certified hereof, denised with himselfe which waies possible he might ridde the Romanes from vnder this grievous poke of seruitude, and dispatch the Tyrant out of this life: Deliberating thus with himselfe, he forecassd also that God he were best to call vpon for aide to wage battaille with the aduersarie. He remembred how that Dioclesian, which wholy dedicated himselfe vnto the seruice of þe hethenish Gods, preuailed nothing thereby: also he perswaded himselfe for certaine, þe his father Constantius, who renounced the Idolatrie of the Gentiles led a more fortunare life, musing thus doubtfully with himselfe, and taking his iourney with his souldiers, I wot not whether, a certaine vision appeared vnto him, as it was strange to behold, so in deepe incredible to be spoken of. About none, the daie somewhat declining, he saw in the skie, a lightsome Pillar in forme of a Crosse, where in these wordes were ingrauen: In this overcome. The which vision so amazed the Emperour, that he mistrusting his owne sight, demanded of them that were present, whether they perceiued the vision: which when all with one consent had affirmed, the wauering mind of the Emperour was settled, with this deuine and wonderfull sight. The night following in his sleepe, hee seeth Christ, which saith thus vnto him: Frame vnto thy selfe the forme of a Crosse after the example of the signe which appeared vnto thee, and beare the same against the enemies, as a fit banner or token of victorie: He being fully perswaded with this oracle, commandeth the victorious signe of the Crosse (which as yet is reserued in the pallace of the Emperour) to be made, and therewith proceededth forwards with great courage, and topning with the enemy, right ouer against Rome, about the bydge commonlie called Bulbia, hee got the victorie, for Maxentius being drowned in the riuer died: it was the seauenth yere of his raigne, when he overcame Maxentius. After these things, when as Lucinius his fellow Emperour, and his brother in lawe, hauing married his sister Constantia, led his life in the East: Constantine enjoying ample benefites receiued at the handes of God, shewed himselfe gratefull in offering of thanks and praises vnto the authoz of all godnes, his practises were these, To deliuer the Christians from persecution: to call againe þe exiled vnto their native soile: to set at libertie such as were in prison: to restore againe the goods of the confiscated, to build againe the Churches that were ouerthrowne: all which which things he accomplished with great promptnesse of minde. But Licinius persecuting the Christians, Constantine waged battaile against him, & making off by Sea and land, in the end, at Chisopolis a Citie of Bythinia, to witte at the Haven of Chalcedon, Licinius was overcome, and yeldeth himselfe to Constantine.

After hee had repressed the ciuill warres, vanquished the Gothes in manie places, and woon great memorie among the Barbarians, he placed the Byztaines that had done him so good seruice, in a part of France towards the west shoare of the Ocean, hee applied himselfe wholly to the studie of the liberall Artes. He summoned the Sicene Councell, which was helde at Nicaea, a Citie of Bythinia, for the debating of the controuersie about the feast of Easter, & the rooting out of the heresie of Arius. Which Councell being ended, he lived in great tranquillitie and turned himselfe wholly to the building of Churches, as well in other Cities as in that Citie which he called after his owne name, Constantinople. In this Citie he created from the foundation two Churches calling the one of Peace, the other of the Apostles.

Helena the Emperours mother (which of the village Drepane made a Citie, the which afterwards the Emperour called Helenopolis) took her iourne to Jerusalem, which when she found lying waste in a heape of stones, she searched diligently for the Sepulchre of Christ, and at length she found it, but with great difficultie; for as they which embraced the faith of Christ, highly esteemed of that Sepulchre and monument after his passion: so such as abhorred Christian Religion, heaped in that place much earth, and raised great hillocks, and builded there the Temple of Venus, and set vp her Idoll. But when the Emperours mother was made priuie thereunto, she threw downe the Idoll: caused the great heape of earth to be hurled downe, where vnder shee found three Crosses in the grane, one vpon the which Christ suffered: other two, whereon the two theeues ended their lines, together with the table of Pilate, where in he had written that Christ was crucified king of the Iewes: the Emperours mother builded ouer the Sepulchre a gorgeous Church, calling it New Jerusalem, right ouer against that olde and waste Jerusalem. She builded a second Church nothing inferiour to the first, at Bethleem in the hollow rocke, where Christ was bozne. Also the third, vpon the mount, where Christ ascended vnto the Father, manie things she gaue to Churches, and to poore people, she liued goodlie and religiously, and departed this life being fourescore yeres olde: her bodie was buried at Constantinople. Symon of Durham writeth, that shee builded walles about the Citie of London, and the Citie of Colchester.

About this time Octavius, whome Constantine had left gouernour in Byztaine, rebelled, against whome Constantine sent Traherne with a legion of Romans, who (after diuers confidates) was slaine: Gracianus surnamed Funarius was at that time gouernour of the Roman legion in Byztaine.

Constantine at the age of 65. yeres died, and was buried at Constantinople, he left behinde him three sonnes, to wit Constantinus, Constance, and Constans, to succede him in the Empire.

Constantinus.

Constantinus beganne his Empire and raigne ouer Byztaine: with him his father Constantine had appointed by his last will, that his two brethren Constant and Constantius should participate and haue their portion of the Empire, but not long after, when Constantinus attempted warre against his brother at Aquileia, and demeaned himselfe vnaduisedly therein, he was slaine, and then was the Empire reduced vnder the government of the two brethren onlie.

Constantius then ruled Byztaine, which he administered with great iustice: but after, when he failed of his health, he associated vnto him in stead of friends, euill disposed persons to assist him, through whose euill counsell he declined into horrible vices, by meane whereof, wanting scant tolerable of the inhabitants of the prouinces, he was slaine by Magnentius, who usurped the Empire in France, Spaine and Byztaine.

Constantius then had the regiment of Byztaine, who sent hither a Spaniard called Paul, a Notarie by profession, to bring out certaine men of war which had conspired with Magnentius: but he vpon false formises grieuously molested the guiltlesse, fettering and manacling whome he pleased. Wherevpon Martinus then lieutenant in Byztaine, being mooued with compassion, desired him to forbear the harmlesse: but he was so rigorous, that he also charged Martinus himselfe of conspiracie with Magnentius, and was earnest to bring him before the Emperour: whereupon Martinus drawing his sworde smote at him, and because he could not slaine him, he sodainly slewe himselfe, and this Paul embzued with blood, haled a great company (linked in chaines) to the Emperours presence, which were either banished, executed, or attained.

Martinus.

Constantius after this appointed Iulianus to governe Gaule, at which time great spoile was made in Byztaine by the Scottes and Pictes, wherefore Iulianus buisted with warre against the Almaines, sent Lupinus hither with an army, in whose absence Iulianus usurped the Empire: whereof when Constantius heard, he returned from the war (against the Parthians) against Iulianus, and died in the way.

362

Marcellinus.

Iulianus (called the Apostata) began his raigne ouer Byztaine and the Empire, a man scene passing wel in the Liberall Sciences, but an earnest aduersarie of Christian religion: he banished Palladius a great and honorable person into Byztaine vpon a suspicion: he sent Alipius who had bene a lieutenant of Byztaine to repaire Jerusalem, but terrible flashes of fire issuing out of the earth, when they laide the foundations, enforced them to leaue their purpose. His Iulian with great preparations made warre vpon the Parthians, he spoiled Assiria, and returning from thence a Conquerour, he was slaine by his enemies, as he pleased vnaduisedly into the battels. After him succeeded in the Empire Iouinian, and held it nine moneths.

Valentinian was then chosen Emperour by the souldiours. The Pictes, Scots, Attacotes, and Saxons, grieuously molested the Byztaines. Nectaridius who had the charge of the sea coasts here, was slaine by them, and Balchobandes a great captaine was enclosed by them: wherefore after diuers captaines taines Theodosius was sent hither, who discomfiting the enemy, and recovering the spoile, entred triumphantlie into London, and the next yeare went into the north, suppressed the enemies, recovered the province, and repaired Cities & fortresses: he oppressed Valentinus an Hungarian, who being banished hither, practised new tumultes, deliuering him to Dulcius to be executed, without any enquire of his confederates, because hee would not renewe the tumulte: which done he returned to Rome. Shortly after Valentinian sent hither Fracmarius (which he before had obtained King of the Succenobants in Germany) to be Marshall of the Almains which serued in Bytaine. And not long after Valentinian died.

Gratian with his brother Valentinian was then created Emperour. Hee to the intent he might better repaire the decayed State of the Empire, made Theodosius a copartner with him in it.

Maximus a valiant and worthy man, was shortly after forced here in Bytaine to take the Empire vpon him, who passed into France, and immediately all the Germane legions and Roman souldiours revolted vnto him from Gratian, so that he being destitute of men of warre, fled to Lions, where he was slaine by treason: for Maximus gaue out that Gratians wife was coming to her husband, which Gratian entirly louing his wife, lightly credited, and therefore accompanied with a few, went south to meete her: but in the coach where he supposed to haue founde his wife, was Andragatius a desperate man, who leaping out of the coach killed Gratian.

Then Maximus created his sonne Victor a Caesar, and vsed some crueltie against Gratians Captaines. Valentinian being herewith terrified, sent S. Ambrose vnto him to treat a peace, which he accepted, and Theodosius permitted him to vse the title of Augustus. Then he settled himselfe at Trier in Germanie, empowert the Countries round about him, executed certain heretikes called Pisseillians, and then entred into Italy, breaking the peace, & thought to haue intercepted Valentinian, but he with his mother fled to Theodosius, and perswaded him to take reuenge of Maximus. In the meane time Maximus came to Aquileia, all Italic and Affrica submitted themselves vnto him, when sodainly Theodosius coming from Constantinople, moued warre against him, corrupted his souldiours with bribes, and after one or two skirmishes forced Maximus to flee to Aquileia, where his owne souldiours deliuered him to Theodosius, by whose commandement he was shortly after beheaded. Andragatius also who kept the seas, vnderstanding this, drowned himselfe, and Victor the sonne of Maximus was slaine in France by Arbogustes. The Bytaines which serued him returned into France, and settled them in the country there, which is now called Bytaine, so was Bytaine recovered againe to the Romane Empire.

doctrine berie farre abroad, holding, that a man might liue well without the helpe of the grace of God: vsing herein the aide of Iulianus of Campania, who was intemperatly stirred with the losse of his bishopricke, to whome S. Austen and other fathers also haue answered in most ample maner, but yet they would not be amended thereby, but being conuicted of their falschode, they rather would encrease it by defending and maintaining it, then amende it by returning to the truth.

This time Marcus was chosen Emperour by the souldiers in Bytaine, fearing the inuasion of the Vandales, but immediatly they slewe him, and elected Gracianus, whom also they murdered within foure moneths.

Then Constantine, a souldier of base estate, onely vpon confidence of his name, was elected here Emperour, who passing hence into France, with all the youth of Bytain, got al the men of warre there to take part with him. Honorius sent therefore Sarus to withstand him, who in a foughten field slewe Iulianian Constantines Captaine, and so pursued Constantine, that he made him take Valenia, wherein he sharply besieged him, untill Gerontius with his Bytaines, and Edebrichus with the Franks raised the siege.

Then Constantine fortified the Alpes and Avene with garrisons, sent Constantine his sonne (whom of a Whorke hee had made a Caesar) with a great armie into Spaine, where he toke, and afterward slewe certaine noble personages allied to Honorius, and returning to his father, left Gerontius to gouerne Spaine. Constantine himselfe then craued pardon of Honorius for vsurping the Empire, saying, that he did it by compulsion, which when Honorius heard, he so well liked of him, that he sent an Imperiall robe vnto him.

In these troubles Bytaine was greatly endangered by Picts and Scots, and sued to Honorius for succour, but he sending them onely Letters, willed them to loke to their owne state. Shortly after Constantine, that was Whorke, was slaine by Gerontius his owne Captaine, at Aenna in France: and Constantine himselfe being besieged at Arles by Honorius Souldiours, entered into holy orders, and fled into the Church, thinking thereby to saue himselfe, but was drawen out from thence, and slaine. Gerontius who had trayterously killed his master, was beset round about with Spaniards in his lodging, wherefore he first slew Allanus his tried friend, then Nunichia his wife, and lastly himselfe, and now Honorius recouered Bytaine. In his time (saith Bede) Rome was destroyed of the Gothes, the 1164. yere after it was builded: after which time the Romans left off to rule in Bytain, almost 470. yeres after that Iulius Caesar first entred the said Ile. The Romanes dwelt within the trench, which as we haue saide, Seuerus drew overthwart the Ilant at the south part, which thing may appeare by the citie, temples, buildes, and pauid streets to this day remaining, notwithstanding they had in possession, & vnder their dominion the farther parts of Bytaine, and also the Islands which are about Bytaine. By means (as is aforesaid) the Romans had vsed to transport with them ouer into France the flower of al the youth of Bytaine, to serue them in their foraine wars, their men of war were consumed, and was not now able to defend themselves against the inuasions of their enemies: wherupon many yeres together they they liued vnder the opprellion of two most cruell nations, the Scots & Picts: which were of the circuite of Brytaine, but diuided from the land of Brytaine by two armes of the sea, running betwixt them, of the which one from the east sea, the other from the west, runne th in far and wide into the land, though they may one reake to the other. In the middle of the east cræke, there is a city builded called Guidi. Aboue the west cræke toward the right hand standeth a citie called Alcluth, which in their language is as much to say, as the rocke Cluth, for it standeth by a cloud of the same name. The Brytaines then being thus afflicted by þe said nations, sent their embassadors with letters vnto Rome, with lamentable supplications, requiring of them aide and succour promising their continuall fealty, so that they would rescue them against the opprellion of their enemies: whereupon there was sent vnto them a legion of armed souldours from Rome, which comming into the Island, and encountring with the enemies, ouerthrew a great number of them, & drave the rest out of the frontiers of the countrey, and so setting them at libertie, and free from the miserie with which they were before so grienously ouercharged, counselled them to make a wall betwene the two seas, which might be of force to keepe out their euill neighbours: and that done, they returned home with great triumph. Now the Brytaines building the wall which they were bid to make, not of stone, as they were willed, but of turfe, as hauing none among them, that had skill therein, made it so slender, that it serued them to little purpose. This wall they made betwene the two armes or crækes of the sea, many miles long, that where the fence of the water lacked, there by the helpe of the trench they might keepe the countrey from the breaking in of their enemies, of which piece of worke, there remaineth euen vnto this day most assured tokens yet to be seene. This trench begunneth about two miles from the monastery of Abercuring, in a place which in the Picts language is called Penuahil, and in English is called Panwelt, and running out westward, is ended by the city Alcluth. But the former enemies, when they had once perceiued that the Romane legion was returned home againe, forthwith being set on land by boats, invaded the borders, ouercame the country, and as it were beate downe all before them: whereupon Embassadors be sent againe to Rome, beseeching them they would not suffer their miserable Countrey to be vicerly destroyed. Againe, there is sent an other legion, which comming vpon a sodain, made a great slaughter of the enemies, & chased them ouer into their owne country. Then the Romanes tolde the Brytaines, that it was not their case to take any more such trauellous iournies for their defence, and therefore bade them to practise their armour themselves, and to learne to withstand their enemies.

They builded vp a wall of hard stone from sea to sea, right betwene the two Cities, which there were made to keepe out the enemy, in the selfe same place where Severus before had cast his trench, with publike and private charges: the Brytaines also putting to their helping hands, they then builded it eight fote broad, and twelue fote high, right as it were by a line from east to west, as it doth to this day appeare. Which being perfected, they gave the people straight warning to take well to themselves, then teach them to handle their weapons, and instruct them in warlike seates. Also by the sea side southward, where the ships lay at harbor, least their enemies should land thereabouts, they made by bulwarks along, one somewhat distant from another: and this done, bid them farewell, as minded no more to reforme. At this time almost all the treasure of Bytaine was hid vnder ground, or transported ouer into France.

As soone as they were gone, the Scots and Idians hauing intelligence that they had made promise they would come no more, they taking heart of grace, retorne againe to their businesse: and first, all that was without the wall, they tooke for their owne. After that, they giue assault vnto the wall, where the Bytaines were with grables pulled downe, and otherwise so assaulted, that they leauing both the Cities and the wall also, were dispersed and put to flight, the enemies following, killed and slayed more cruellie then euer they did before, whereupon being driuen out of their owne houses, and possessions, they fall a robbing and spoyling one the other of them, so farre forth, that all the whole country was brought to that exigent, that they had none other sustenance, but that they got by hunting and killing of wilde beastes.

Theodosius the younger, sonne of Arcadius, succeeded his uncle Honorius, and appointed Valentinianus his cousin, Emperour in the West partes.

At this time, Timotheus here in Bytaine, vnder a pretence of religion, and great continence, drew many into a dangerous heresie.

Chrysanthus the son of bishop Martian, a Consull of Italy was made vice-roy and Lord deputy of Bytaine: he was afterwarde made Bishop of Constantinople.

Now the poore remnant of the Bytaines directed letters to Aetius, whereof this was the beginning: To Aetius thrise Consul, the mourning of the Brytains. In the proesse of which Epistle, they thus set forth their pittifull estate. The barbarous enemy driuerh vs vpon the sea: the sea againe vpon the enemy: betwene these twaine riseth two maner of deaths, either we are killed or drowned. And yet for all their suite, they coulde obtaine no aide of him, as he which had then both his hands full of busines and battaile at home with Bleda and Attila, Kings of the Hunnes.

heresie.

The Delagian heresie being brought in by Agricola, the sonne of Seuerianus a Delagian bishop, about this time did sore corrupt the faith of the Bytaines, but the Bytaines being neither willing to receiue their lewd doctrine, as blasphemous against the grace of God, neither able to refute their wily and wicked persuasions, they deuised this wholesome counsell, to take for aide of the Bishops of France, against these their spiritual enemies. And they calling a common counsell, consulted among the miselues, whom of the all it were best to send to help their neighbors faith. By the assent of them all there was chosen two worthy prelates, Germanus Aquisodorenfis, and Lupus Bishop of the Citie Trecaffa, which should passe ouer into Bytaine to confirme them in the faith, which with readie obedience accepting the commandement of the synode, tooke shipping thitherward, and had prosperous winde, which set them a shoare in place where they themselves desired. Whether a great multitude of people being assembled, receiued the Priestes of God, and the worde of God was preached by them, not onely in their Churches, but also in the open streets, and in the Countrey, in such sort, that in all places both the sound and faithfull were confirmed, and they that before swarued out of the right faith, were amended. The Authoꝝ and head professors of this hereticall error, lay lurking all this while, and much spited to see the people daily to fall from them. After long aduise ment bled, they take vpon them to trie the matter by open disputation, which being agreed vpon, they come forth richly appointed, gorgeously apparelled, accompanied with a number of flattering fauourers. The people were present both to see and iudge the matter. The parties were sette unlike of condition: on the one side was the faith, on the other, mans presumption: on the one side, mekenesse, on the other side, pride: on the one side, Pelagius, on the other, Christ. First of all Germanus and Lupus gaue their aduersaries leaue to speake, which vainely occupied both the time and cares of the people with naked wordes. But after the reuerend Bishoppes powred out their words confirmed with Scriptures out of the Gospelles and Apostles. Thus the vanitie of Heretikes was conuited, and falsehood conuited, so that at euery oblation, they were forced to confesse their error, not being able to answer them: but after their departure, the heresie beganne againe to reuiue. Wherefore Germanus returned into Brytaine with Seuerus, banished the heretikes, and restored the faith.

Pelagians heresie confuted.

The end of the Romans gouernment in Brytaine.

He Brytaines continued in doubtfull war with the Scots and Pictes, sometime bearing away the victorie, and sometime leauing it to the enemie. But considering the ambitious minds of men, and fearing least some should blurpe the kingdome at home, while they were detained with warres abroad, thought god to appoint ouer them some king: and so with one consent they elected Vortiger.

Vortiger reigned in Brytaine, in whose time hunger more preuailing against the Brytaines, droue many of them to yeld themselves into the hands of their enemies. Other there were which could neuer be brought thereinto, but from the hilles and hazels where they lurked, many times invaded their enemies, as trusting so much the more in the helpe of God, how much the lesse hope they had of aide of men, and by such meanes, first of all both resisted and ouerthrew them, which many yeeres together had liued by the spoile of the Countrey, whereby for the time they dꝛe to home ward with shame enough, intending not long after to returne.

The Pictes then, and long time after, kept themselves quiet at home, saue onely they woulde nowe and then make inuasions into the lande, and dꝛue away booties of cattell. After that they dꝛe to a quietnesse, there ensued such plentie of graine as neuer was seene the like before, as farre as any man could remember, whereof the people grew to loose and wanton living, where of al manner of lewdnesse followed, specially crueltie, hate of trueth, and lone of lying, insomuch, that if any were gentler and moze given to trueth then o-ther, the other would worke him all the hurt and spite they could. This did not onely the Seculars, but also the Cleargie, and the heads thereof, giuing the- selues ouer to drunkennesse, pride, contention, enuie, and such other, casting from them the yoke of Christ.

In the meane season, a bitter plague befell among them for their corrupt living, consuming in short time such a multitude of people, that the quicke were not sufficient to burie the dead: and yet for all that, the remnant remain- ed so hardened in sinne, that neither their friendes death, nor feare of their owne, could cure the murreine of their soules, which daily perished through their sinnefull living: whereby a great stroke of Gods vengeance ensued vpon the whole sinnefull nation: for being now infested againe with their old neigh- bours the Scottes and Pictes, they deuised with themselves what was best to doe, and where they might seeke rescue to withstand and repell the feare of the Northerne nation: and they agreed all with their king Vortiger, to demand aide of the Sarons beyond the Seas, which thing doubtlesse (saith Bede) was done by Gods owne appointment, that the people might be thereby plagued, as by the ende it manifestly appeared.

W. Malmes.

The people of the English or Sarons, being sent for of the said king into Brytaine, landed here in three long ships, and by the kings commandement, were appointed to abide in the east part of the land. And the Ile of Thanet was giuen to them, they to defend their countrey like friends: but indeed, as it pro- ued after ward, minding to destroy the Countrey as enemies. Wherefore in- counting with the Northerne enemy, the Sarons had the better, whereof they sending word home into their Countrey, as also of the fruitfulnessse of the land, the Sarons sent ouer a great nauy and number of men better appoin- ted for the warres, which being now ioined with the former band, grew to a stronger army then all the power of the Brytaines was able to overcome. Those by the Brytaines were allowed a place to dwell among them, with that condition, that they should warre for them against their enemies, for wages of the Brytaines.

These Sarons, English, and Iutes that came from beyonde the Seas, were three of the strongest Nations in Germanie. Of the Iutes came the people of Kent, and the Ile of Wight, and also they in the prouince of West Sarons are called Iutes right ouer against the Ile of Wight. Of the Sar- ons (that is, of the Region now called olde Sarons) descended the East Sar- ons, the South Sarons, and the West Sarons. Of the English descended the East English, the Mercies, and the Northumbers. The chiefe Captaines of the Sarons are saide to be two brethren, Hengist and Horsa. This Hen- gist (saith Geoffrey Monmouth) on a tyme required of King Vortiger, so much ground as mought be compassed with a thong of a bulles skinne, there- upon to build a place to rest in, which the king granted, where Hengist built a Castell, Castell, which hee called Thong Castell, and therein feasted King Vortiger with great royaltie, and when night was come that the king shoulde go to rest, Rowen the daughter of Hengist by commaundement of her father, came with a cuppe of gold in her hand, and kneeling before the king, said to him, Wassalle, and he againe, by counsell of an interpreter, answered, Drinke haile: at which time king Vortiger seeing the beauty of this Rowen, hee was enamoured, and desired to haue her to wife, which was graunted by her father on condition, the king shoulde giue him all the country of Kent, for him and his people to dwell in, which the king willingly, but vnadvisedly graunted, and espoused the Damocell.

Thong Castell in Kent, is now a small village, little more then halfe a mile from Sidingbozne. The ditches, and the keepe hill of Thong Castell appeare in a little wood a two slight shote south from Thong Church. Thong is a mile from the mouth of Spelton creeke, and about halfe a mile from Spelton towne, if passage were through the Parishes the next way.

For the loue that Vortiger bare to Rowen the Saron, he was diuorced from his lawfull wife, by whom he had thre sonnes, for which deede, welnere all the Bytaines forsooke him.

Vodine Archbishop of London, a man of singular deuotion and good life, by the aduise of Vortimer, went to Vortiger, and saide to him, that hee had not done as a christian Prince, in departing from his lawfull wife, and taking another woman, whose father was an enemy to the christian faith, and also went about to conquer the Crowne of Bytaine. Then saide Vortiger, I was not wise when I brought the Sarons to help me against mine enemies, but I was more vnwise, when I was taken with the inordinate lust of the daughter of Hengist, I knowe that mine Empire will be terrible, except I repent me with speede and turne to God.

ueth the king.

Hengist hearing Vortiger make this lamentation, blamed him, for that hee belaued the perswasions of a prophane man, of fained life (as he termed him) and forthwith slewe the good Archbishop Vodine, and many other priestes, and religious persons. All the Churches in Kent were polluted with blood, the Spuns, with other religious persons, were by force put from their houses and goods, and constrained to pollution of their bodies.

Archbishop of London slaine.

The Bytaines considering the daillie repaire of the Sarons into this Realme, shewed to their king the leoperdy that might the reof ensue, and aduertised him of the danger, but all was in vaine: for Vortiger, by reason of his wife, bare such fauour to the Sarons, that he would in no wise heare the counsell of his subiects, therefore, they with one minde depriued him of his royall dignitie, when he had raigned sixe yeres, and ordained to be their king Vortimer his eldest sonne.

Vortimer pursued the Sarons, and by his martiall knightthode fought against them foure battelles, besides diuers skirmishes, untill at length he was poisoned by the means of Rowen his stepmother, after he had raigned sixe yeres. The first battell Hengist and Horse, who were (saith Bede the sonnes of Wigliffe, whose father was Vecta, whose father was Woden, fought with Vortimer, and his byrther Catigerne in a place called Ægelfthorpe, now Ælfstord in Kent: and notwithstanding that Horfe was slaine in this bartel, yet Hengist bare away the victory. Bede saith that Horfe was buried in east Kent, where his tombe or monument, bearing his name was in his time to be seene. And true it is, that in Kent is a place, to this daie called Hyorsted, about two miles from Ælfstord, in the parish of Chesham, where the people of that countrie say the said Horfe was slaine. There was also slaine in the same battaille at Ægelfthorpe Catigerne brother to Vortimer, whose monument remaineth till this day, on a great plain heath in the parish of Ælfstord, & is now corruptly called Cits cotihons, for Catigerne. (I haue my selfe in companie of diuers worshipfull and learned Gentlemen behelde it in Anno 1590.) and is of foure flat stonnes, one of them standing byrigh in the middle of two other, inclosing the edge sides of the first, and the fourth laid flat aloft the other thre: and is of such height, that men may stand on either side the middle stone in time of storme or tempest, safe from wind and rain, being defended with the bredth of the stonnes, as hauing one at their backes, one on eyther side, and the fourth ouer their heades. And about one coites cast from this monument lieth an other great stone, much part thereof in the ground, as fallen downe where the same had bene fied.

The second battaille Hengist and Eske fought with the Brytaines in a place called Crecanford, or Craford in Kent, of the Brytaines many perished by the sword, the rest of them abandoned Kent altogether, and with great feare fled to London.

The thirde battaille, Hengist and Eske fought with the Brytaines in a place called Weppe's fleete, that is to saie, the fleete of Weppe, where they killed Dukes or Captaines of the Brytaines, with manie other, whereas on the partie of the Saxons there was one onelie man slaine, whose name was Weppe.

The fourth battaille was fought by Hengist and Eske against the Brytaines, nere to a þowe called Colmore, the which was soe fought by the Saxons, and long continued with great danger to the Brytaines, because that the said þowe inclosed a part of their hoste so strongly, that the Brytaines coule not approach to them, being beaten off with the enemies shotte, albeit in the ende, the Saxons were put to flight, and manie of them drowned in the same þowe.

Vortiger obtained againe the kingdome, & shortly after Hengist, which was chased into the Ile of Manet, entred the land with a number of Saxons, but when he heard of the great assembly the Brytaines had made against him, he treated for peace, which in fine was concluded. Shortly after Hengist (by a guile which before he had deuised) bid his sonne in law, and three hundred of his Nobles unto a feast or banquet, where when he had ouerlaid his guests with ouermuch wine, he fell to quarrelling, and with taunting talke, pinched euerie one of them, and straight fell to fighting, where through the Brytaines were slaine euerie one. The king was taken prisoner, and forced to giue for his ransom, Kent, Sussex, Suffolke, and Northfolke. This murder of the Brytaines taines was on the plaine of Salisbury. Then Hengist beganne his dominie on ouer Kent, & Vortiger fled into Wales, and builded there a Castell, of which building, and long let of the same, and of his Prophet Merlin, Geoffrey Monm. and others speake many things. Great companies of the Saxons daily flocked into this land, and grew so strong, that the people of the countrey which sent for them, stood in great feare of their puissance, for those Saxons had taken league with the Idids, & began to turne their force vpon the Brytaines: and to be short, the fire once kindled in the lands of the Pagans there, tooke lust reuenge of the wickednes of the people, raging first vpon the cities and country next adjoining, after from the east sea to the west, ouerwhelming all the whole land without resistance: both publike and private houses were overthrowne to the ground: the priests were slaine standing at the altar: the bishops with their flock were murdered, without respect of their dignity, nor there was any that would bury the slaine: some of the miserable leauings being taken in the hills, were there killed: other being sterued with hunger, were faine to craepe out of their caues, & buy their victual at their enemies hands, with sale of their libertie for euer, if yet they were not killed out of hand: other fled ouer the seas with an heavy hart: other carrying still in their country in feare of death, and lacke of food, liued full miserably in the mountaines, woods, and cliffes. Aurelius Ambrose, and Vher (brethren of Constantine that was before slaine in France) landed with a nauie of ships at Eotnes, made warre vpon Vortiger, and burned him in his castell in Wales, when he had secondly reigned sixe yeeres.

Aurelius Ambrose was ordained king of Brytaine, in whose time the Brytaines by little and little began to take strength and courage vnto them, comming out of their caues in which they lurked before, and with one consent, calling for heavenly helpe, that they might not for euer be bitterly destroyed, they hauing for their captaine and leader, the foresaid Ambrosius Aurelius, assembled themselves togither, and prouoking the victors to fight, through Gods assistance atchieued the victorie, and from that day forthward, were the men of the country. Now the enemy had the victorie, untill the yeere that Bathe was besieged, where they gaue their enemies a great overthrow, which was about the foure and fortieth yeere of their comming into the land. But of this wee shall speake more hereafter.

Of this Ambrosius, William Malmesburie writeth thus: Surelie, euen then (saith he) the Brytaines had gone to woracke, if Ambrosius, who onelie and alone of all the Romanes, remained in Brytaine, and was Monarch of the Realme, after Vortiger, had not kepte vnder the proude Barbarians, with the notable trauaille of the warriour Arthur. Now it followeth in Geoffrey, that this Ambrosius caused Churches to be repaired, which had bene spoiled by the Saxons: hee caused also the great stones to be set on the plaine of Salisbury, which is called Stonehenge, in remembrance of the Brytaines that were slaine and buried there, in the reigne of Vortiger, at the banquet, and communication of Hengist with the Saxons. This ancient monument is yet to be seene, and is a number of stones, rough and of a gray colour, 25. foote in length, and about 10. foote in breadth, they are layned.

The Chronicles of the Brytains do testifie, that whereas the Saxons, about the yere of our Lord 450. had slaine 480. of the Brytaines Nobility by treason, and under colour of a treaty, Aurelius Ambrose now King of the Brytains, desirous to continue their memorie, with some worthy monument, caused these stones to be set vp in place of their murder and buriall, the which stones hadde bene first brought from Affrike into Ireland, and placed on Pounte Kyllare, and from thence by the industrious meanes of Merlin, were conueyed to this place to the foresaide end. There are about this place, certaine litle hilles, or banks, vnder the which are found sometimes bones of bigge men, and peces of armor, also not far from thence remaine old ruines of the maner of a fortreffe, which the Romans (as it is not unlike) did build there in times past.

tioned, it is to be noted, that Bath in Somersetshire standeth lowe, compassed about with hills, wherby it is evident, that either it is remoured from that place where it stood in Nenius time, or els that y<sup>e</sup> place whiche he called Badonicus mons, was not this towin it selfe, as Leiland and other coniecture, but some other high place néere, which is not unlikely, for at this day withyn a mile of it, ener a towin called Bannae downe, which is so called, either corruptly for Bathen downe, or els in memozy of the Banners displayed there, Banner downe, and seemeth to me both vpon the sight of the place, and report of such as haue gathered caps full of mens teeth in following the plow there, to be the same that Nenius (corruptly called Gildas) or Bede meaneth, though Polidor mistakes it for Blanche-moore. Thus much for Badon hill: now to the historie.

Afterward Arthur raised the siege which the Saxons had planted about Lincolne, & slew them in great numbers. On the other side (saith W. Mal.) though the English Saxons were tossed with y<sup>e</sup> variable dalliance of fortune, yet they did alwaies supply their armies when they were decayed with their countrymen which came to him, and therefore with the better courage they ran vpon the weapons of their enemies, & when the inhabitants by little and little quailed and gaue ouer, they spread themselves through the whole Island. Gods pleasure being so, in whose hand & power the alteration and change of al kingdomes is, and doth consist, but these things came to passe in procelle of time and yeres.

Arthur hauing abated the rage of the Saxons as is aforesayed, and reduced his countrey to quietnesse, he constituted the order of the round table, into the which order he only retained such of his nobilitie as were most renowned for vertue and chualtrie. This round table he kept in diuers places, especiallie at Carlion, Winchester, and Camalet in Somersetshire. This Camalet somtime a famous towne, or castle standeth at the South end of the Church of South Cadbury, the same is situat on a very for or hill, wonderfully strengthened by nature, to the which be two entrings by, by very steepe way, one by north, another by South west. The very rate of the hill, whereon this fortresse stood, is more then a mile in compasse. In the vpper part of the top of the hill be foure ditches or trenches, and a balky wal of earth bettwixt euery one of them. In the very toppe of the hill aboue all the trenches, is Magna area or campus, of 20. acres or more, where in diuers places men may see foundations, and rudor of wals. There was much darkis blew stone, that people of the billage there by hath caried away. This top within the vpper wal being more then 20. acres, hath often bene plowed, and borne very good corne, much gold, silver, & copper of the Romans coines hath bin found there in plowing, & likewise in the fields about the roots of this hill, with many other antique things especially by East.

There was found in the memozy of men a horse shoe of silver at Camalet. The people can tell nothing there but that they haue heard say y<sup>e</sup> Arthur much resorted to Camalot. The old Lord Hungarford was owner of this Camalot, since, Hasting Earle of Huntingdon by his mother, &c.

There is yet to be seene in Denbigh shire, in the parish of Llanfanan, in the side of a stonie hill, a place compasse, wherin be foure and twenty seats for men to sit in, some lesse, and some bigger, cut out of the maine Rock by mans hand, where While Arthur was valiantlie occupied in his wars beyond the Seas, (where he wrought many wonders, as some haue written, but far unlike to be true.) Mordred, to whome he had committed the gouernement of Brytaine, confederating himselfe with Cerdicus first king of the West Saxons, traiterously besurped the kingdome, of which treason, when relation came to Arthur, hee spee-

More then 600. yeres after his death, to wit, about the yere of Christ 1189.
which was the last yere of the reigne of king Henry the second, his bodie was founde, buried in the Churchyard, betwixt two pillars, xvi. fote deepe vnder entred about 7. fote deepe into the earth, they found a mightie broade stone, with a leaden Crosse fastened to that part which laie downewardes towardes

This inscription was grauen on that side of the Crosse which was next to the stone, so that till the Crosse was taken from the stone, it was not sene. His body was found, not inclosed within a tombe of stone, but within a great tree made hollowe like a trough, the which being digged vp and opened, therein was found the bones of Arthur, which were of a maruellous bignesse, as Giraldus Cambrensis, a learned man that then liued, reporteth to haue heard of the Abbot of Glasseburie, of whome he was enformed that the shin-bone of Arthur being set vpon by the leg of a very tall man, came about his knee the bredth of three fingers. The skull of his head of a wonderfull bignesse, in the which head there appeared the prints of x. wounds or mo: all the which were growne into one seame, except onely that whereof hee died, which being greater then the other appeared verie plaine. Also in opening the tombe of his wife Guineuer, that was buried with him, they found the tresses of her haire whole and perfect, finely platted, of colour like to gold, but being touched fell to dust: the Abbot of that house (sometime Prior of Bermondsey) was named Henry Bloys, and was nephew to king Henry the second, by whose commandement the buriall of Arthur was searched for and found. Whose bones, with the bones of Guineuer his wife being found, were remoued into the newe great Church, (for the old was burned in Anno, 1171.) and there buried in a faire Tombe of Marble, laying the bones of the king at the head of the Tombe, and the bones of the Quene at his fete toward the West. The Crosse of leade with the in-

This Malgo was in proportion of body, greater then all the Dukes of Brytaine, but he delighted in the foule sin of Sodomie. He slew his first wife, and then toke to wife his owne brothers daughter.

Caraticus began to rule the Brytaines. This man loued ciuill warre, and was odible both to God and to his subiectes. They moued the Saxons (being accompanied with Gurmundus king of Ireland) to make warre vpon Caraticus, in such wise, that hee was fayne to take the Towne of Cicester, where they assaulted him soze, and fired the corne, by tying fire to the winges of Sparrowes, that he with his men fledde from thence into Wales: by which meanes, hee lost a great part of his dominion, and ended his life, when hee hadde reigned thre yeres.

Cadwalladar (saith Gefsey) was ordained king of the Brytaines, and ruled only liij. yeeres: he banquished and slew Lothier king of Kent, & Athelwold king of south Saxons: and then forsaking his kingly authoritie, hee went to Rome, there to be christened, who after became a Monk, and was buried in S. Peters Church at Rome. He was last king of Brytaine, (saith Gefsey) but Bede thewesth, that Lothier king of Kent was slaine by Edrike, who succeeded him in that kingdome of Kent, and Ethelwold he saith was slaine by a Saxon called Ceadwalla li. of the West Saxons, which Ceadwalla went to Rome, and was there buried as ye may read in the historie of the West Saxon kings.

Now are we come to the time wherein God (who for the sinnes of the people translateth kingdomes) dispossessed the Brytaines of their ancient habitation, and rule of this land, who by the victorie of Saxons were enforced, either to miserable seruitude, or diuened into the Westerne partes of the Isle, now called Wales and Cornwall, (where they now inhabite,) or els to their countrey men the Brytaines in France. They also called the Brytaines Walshmen, as who should say strangers, that vse an vnknown tongue. This happened in the reigne of Ceadwalla king of the West Saxons, whome Gefsey Monmouth calleth Cadwalladar king of the Brytaines about the yere of Christ, 685. when the Brytaines being waisted with ciuill dissention, pestilence and famine, lost all that small that they had long time painfully kept, and were couched in a corner. Thus much for the Brytaines, and now shall be shewed the reigne of the Saxons, who enioying the fertile soile of this Realme, parted it in pcesse of time into seauen kingdomes: Kent, Southsex, East-angles, East-saxons, Mercia, Northumberland, and West-saxons, which the learned call the Heptarchie of the Saxons, of which kingdomes, I purpose (for auoyding of confusion) to treat severally, setting downe the limits of these Countreies, with the succession, actes, and ciuill battailes of their pettie kings, vntill the time that this Heptarchie, or gouernment of seauen, was reduced to a Monarchie, or regiment of one.

Ethelbert the sonne of Emericus had the gouernment of this kingdome, by the space of lxx. (or after Beade, lvi.) yeres. This Ethelbert in the beginning of his raigne being but a childe, was troubled with warres on euerie side, that he could hardly defend his owne coasts. In his first battaile against Ceauline king of the West Saxons & Cutha his sonne, he was forced to make his flight into Kent, hauing two of his Dukes Oslauc and Cnebbero slaine in a place called Guibaduni: but when he came to moze age, and was moze cunning in warre, in short space he ouercame all the kingdomes of the Saxons round about him, saue the Northumbers. And to the ende hee would haue acquaintance with foraine princes, he made affinity and alliance with the king of Fraunce by the marryng of his daughter Berta, a Christian woman, to whom he permitted to vse the lawes and rites of her Countrey, and to haue a Bishop, whose name was Letardus, to remaine with her, for her better instruction in the lawes of God. By this means the barbarous and Heathen Saxons keeping company with the French, did agree to haue all one lawe and like customes: besides this, the chaste and vertuous life of Letardus the Bishoppe, and the other French, which came with the Quene; changed the kings minde vnto the knowledge of Christ, whereby it came to passe, that afterward hee did so soone geue place to the preaching of Augustine. At this time (sayeth Beade) the Wyrtaines being at quiet, little regarding the stormes past in their fathers daies, and hauing respect onely to the present prosperous estate in the which they then liued, were so set to breake all good orders of truely and iustice, that that scant any token or remembrance thereof remained, but only in a few, among many other of their doings, which their owne Historiographer Gildas, doth lamentably set forth in writing (he saith) of them thus) that they neuer took care to preach the Gospell of Christ vnto the Angles and Saxons, which inhabited the land among them. But yet the goodnes of God prouided for the said nation of the Angles, much more worthy preachers, by whom they might be brought to the faith.

Pope Gregorie moued of godlie inclination in the hundred forty and seuen yere after the arrivall of the Angles in Brytaine, sent Augustine, Melitus, Iustus and Iohn, with sundrie other Monkes that liued in the seate of S. D. D., to preach the Gospell, to the nation of the Angles in Brytaine, which landed in the Isle of Thanet, and were first receiued by Ethelbert king of Kent, whom they conuerted to the Christian faith with diuers of his people in the 34. yere of his raigne: and king Ethelbert delaying no time, gaue vnto Augustine the Citie of Canterburie, who furthered thus by the king, receiued at his handes an olde Church, sometime founded there by the faithfull Romanes, and dedicated the same to our Saniour Iesus Christ, which since was called Austins

This yere 603. died Pope Gregory the first, upon the first of March, being the seconde yere of Phocas the Emperour, after hee had gouerned the Romanee Sea 13. yeres, 6. monethes, and 10. daies, after whome succeeded Sabinian the first.

About this time (saith Bede) Augustine (by the aide of king of Ethelbert) called together the Bishoppes and Doctors of the greatest prouince and neere to him, which were the Brytaines, to commune with him, in a place which to this daie is called Augustines Wake, as yet woulde saie the power and strength of Austin, being in the borders of the Vicians and West Saxons. There hee beganne with brotherlie admonition (saith Bede) to perswade them to peace, and Catholike vnitie with him, and to communicate with him for Gods sake the labour of preaching the Gospell to the Heathen of England: for as yet they kept not the Easter Sundae in due time, but from the fourteenth to the twentieth Mone, which compt is concluded in compasse of eightie foure yeres. They vsed moreover, manie other things contrarie to the vnitie of the Church, which when they had bene with long discourse declared, and these men, neyther for prayers, rebukes, or threats of Augustine and his companie woulde giue their assent, but rather preferred their owne traditions before all other Churches which throughout the worlde, agreed with Augustine in Christ. Whereupon Augustine fell to prayer, and also restored a blinde man to sight (saith Bede) which the Brytaines

Second Synode

Monastery of Bangor.

The Bypaines counsell to an Anchorite.

Austine requir-eth 3. thinges of the Bypaines

The Bypaines refuse Austine to be their Archbyschop, or so obey him in any thing. Austine threat-eth the Byp- saines.

coulde not doe, and therefore confessed indeede that to bee the true waie of righteousness which Austine had preached and shewed them, but yet they saide they coulde not alter their olde customes without the consent of their Cleargie and people. They desired therefore to haue a seconde Synode of a greater multitude. Which when it was appoynted to bee so, there came by report seven Bypaine Byschoppes, and many other well learned men, especially out of their greatest Monasterie of Bangor, where at that time Dinoh was Abbot.

These men beeing nowe readie to goe to the foresayde Synode, came first to a certayne holie and wise man (which liued there about an Anchorites life) to aske his counsell, whether they ought at Austines preaching and exhortation leaue their traditions or no, who aunswared them: if (quoth he) hee bee a man of God, followe him. But howe shall wee proue (sayde they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchorite aunswared, our Lorde saith, take on you my yoke, and learne you of me, for I am milde, and humble of heart: it is likelie that himselte beareth the yoke of Christ, and will offer you the same to beare; but if he be curst and proude, it is certaine, that he is not of God, neither must we much esteeme his wordes.

Then they enquired of him howe they might knowe whether this Austine were proude or not, marie (quoth hee) prouide ye that hee with his companie come first to the place of the Synode, or Councell house. And if when ye approach nere, he ariseth courteously to you, thinke ye that hee is the seruant of Christ, and so heare ye him obedientlie; but if hee despise you, nor will bouchsafe to rise at your presence, which are the moze in number, let him likewise bee despised of you.

And truelie as this Anchorite bade them, so did they, for it happened that when they came thither, Austine was alreadie there, and sate in his chayre, which when they saue, straightwaie waring wroth, they noted him of pryde, and therefore endenoured to ouerthwart and gaine say whatsoener he proposed, his Orat ion chiefly was thus: Although deare brethren in many other points ye doe contrarie to our custome, or rather contrarie to the custome of the vniuersall Church of Christ; yet notwithstanding, if ye will in these thre things consent vnto me: that is, to celebrate the Easter in due time, to accomplish the ministerie of Baptisme, according to the Romane and Apostolike Church, and last of all to preach with vs to this English nation the worde of our Lorde, all your other Ceremonies, Rites, and Customes, though they bee contrary to ours, yet we will willingly suffer, and bee contente to beare with them. But they answered, they would doe none of the thinges requested, neither would account him for their Byschoppe: saying nate, if hee would not so much as rise to vs, cruelie the moze we should now subiect our selues to him, the moze would hee hereafter despise vs, and set vs at naught. To whome Austine the at fullie prophesied, that if they would not take peace, and bee at accord with their brethren, they should receiue and seele warre from their enemies. And if they would not preach to the Englishmen the waie of life, they should suffer at their hand, and by their power the vengeance of death, which thin thing came to passe afterwarde, as shall bee shewed in the raigne of Edilfride King of the Northumbers.

The saide yere of Christ 603. also died Augustine the Archbyschop, the xxvi. day of May, after the decease of Saint Gregory, two monethes, two weekes, & two daies. And after him selfe had bene consecrated Archbyschoppe of Canterburie, epght yeres, five monethes, and 21. daies, but before hee deceased, he ordained Laurence to succede him in the Archbyschoppicke, which hee saue in his life time the rather perfourmed, least that after he was deade, the state of the Church (being as yet but rude and latelie conuerted) might begin to waue and fall, if it shoulde haue lacked a pastour or ruler neuer so little a while: his bodie was for a time layde in the porch of the forenamed Church of Saint Peter and Paul, because the Church was not yet finished nor dedicated, but shortly after the dedication of the same, (which was done by Laurence his successor) hee was translated into the Church, and layde on the North side thereof decentlie. And vpon his Tombe was written this Epitaph. Hic requiescit Dominus Augustinus Dorobornensis Episcopus primus, &c. Here resteth blessed Augustine, the first Archbyschoppe of Dorobornia, who being sent hither of his lie Gregory, Byschoppe of Rome, and strengthened of God by the working of miracles, conuerted king Ethelbert and his people from the worshipping of Idoles, to the faith of Christ, and fulfilling in peace the dayes of this office, he died the 26. day of May, in the raigne of the same king Ethelbert.

Augustine.

The noble king Ethelbert, making prouision for them that shoulde come after, brought the lawes of his countrey into the mother tongue, thereby to rewarde the good accordingly, and to withstand the wicked by seuerer meanes, and left nothing whereof his posteritie needed to doubt in any matter, and then after his temporall raigne, which he had kept most gloriouslie ouer the Kentish Saxons, the space of 54. (or after Bede 56.) yeres, he entred into the eternall blisse of the kingdome of heauen vpon the foure and twentieth day of February being the eleuenth yere after that he had receiued the faith of Christ, and the ninetenth yere after S. Augustine with his company were sent to the English nation to preach: he was the third king, and reigned ouer all the South prouinces, which are separated from the North by the Riuer of Humber, and the borders adioyning thereunto. King Ethelbert being married to the Ladie Bertha a Christian woman, and daughter of the king of France, receiued of her a sonne named Edbald, (who married Emma the daughter of the king of France) and a daughter named Ethelburge other wise called Tate, that was married to Edwin king of Northumberland, which Edwin was conuerted to the faith by Byschop Pauline. The place of king Ethelberts burfall was in Saint Martines parish within the church of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul neere Canterburie, on the North side of the same church, which he builded from the ground as before is declared, where also the noble Ladie Quene Bertha his wife was buried before him, and the byshop Lucardus that came out of France with her, and vpon his graue was left this inscription.

Edbald

Edbald when he had taken vpon him to rule the Realme, and stood no longer in awe of his father, he did not only refuse to accept the faith of Christ, but was also polluted with such a fornication as the Apostle witnesseth neuer had been heard of among the Gentiles, which is, that he had married his fathers wife, with the which two haynons facts he gaue occasion to his subjects to returne to their former filth, which vnder his fathers raigne for fauour or for feare of the king had yielded to the lawes of christian faith, & chastity: but the scourge of God, and vengeance from heauen wanted not to the punishment of this vnfaithfull king, for he was plagued with often frensie of minde, and raging forie of an vncleane spirit, but by Laurence Archbishop of Canterbury, he was at length conuerted from his Idolatry, and vnlawfull sinne, and was turned againe to the faith, and being baptizd, he endeoured to maintaine the state of the Church in all points to the bittermost, he builded a Chappell within the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul, and gaue to that Monastery a great portion of land, he is said to be the first founder of Fulkstone in Kent, but I haue seen no Charter thereof, he raigned 25. yeres, and was buried by his father in the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul.

ERcombert the sonne of Edbald by Emma his wife, hee first suppressed the Temples of the Idoles, and because his people were giuen to excess, commanded a solemn fast of fortie daies long, to bee obserued throughout all his kingdome, and raigned twentie fve yeres. It is recorded in the antiquities of Christs Church in Canterburie, that about this time Honorius Archbishop of Canterburie diuided his prouince into Parishes. Which Honorius decessed in Anno 693. when hee had sate Archbyschoppe twentie yeres.

EGbert his sonne succeded, whose quiet government for a long season was afterward defaced by the cruell murder of Ealbert, and Egelbright his cousins Germans, whom either he slew himselfe, or procured to be slaine by a traitor named Thunor: he raigned nine yeres.

The Ladie Dompneua next true heire to the Crowne from Edbald, erected a Monasterie called Winster in the Isle of Thanet, and became first Abbesse there.

LOrharius succeded his brother Egbert, who being assaulted oftentimes by Eadrike the sonne of Egbert, in a cruell fight was shot through with a dart, whereof he died vnder his Surgeons hands, when hee had raigned thirtene yeres, and was buried with his predecessors kings, in the Monastery of Peter and Paul by Canterburie.

EDricke the sonne of Egbert, within the space of two yeres lost both life and kingdome. After his death the kingdome being sometime gouerned by blaspers, and sometime by forreiners, began to decay.

The Kentishmen, by casting of fire, did cruellie burne Moll the brother of Cedwall King of the West Saxons, and twelue of his knights with him: wherewith Cedwall being moued to furie, did miserable harrie and spoile all Kent, so that by the space of fve yeres, there was no king in that Countrey.

Withredus

Wihredus the sonne of Egbert purchasing peace with money, was then established king, in which state he behaved himselfe very honourably, both in peace and warre. He founded the Monastrie of Saint Martin at Doner, and reigned xxxiiij. yeres, with whom king Swebhearde reigned jointly in one part of his kingdome.

Egbert the sonne of Wichred walked in his fathers ordinances, and had like successe, and reigned threë and twentie yeres.

The yere 729. two dreadfull Starres appeared, the one before the Sunne rising, the other after the Sunne setting, both which appeared in the moneth of Januarie, the space of 15. daies, and carried with them the likenesse of a bundle of fire against the North, and somewhat towards the West, at which time the Pagans infested France and Spaine.

Elbert his brother succeeded, in whose time the Citie of Canterburie (as is to be thought) was burned by chance: he reigned not xi. yeres, and was buried in the Monastrie of Peter and Paul at Canterburie.

Alricke the thirde sonne of Wichred ruled Kent after his brethren, and was vanquished in a fought fielde against Offa king of the Mercians: he reigned foure and thirtie yeres, and was the last of the line or succession of the kings of Kent.

765

Elbert or Egbert otherwise called Pren, then usurped the kingdome, and denied warre against the Mercians, by whom he was taken prisoner, and not long after released, but the Kentishmen would not receive him, Cuthred then usurped, and bare a title of a Kentish king for the space of eight yeres.

799

Balred the heyre of Cuthred then tooke on him the Princely dignitie, but Egbert king of the West Saxons so discomfited him in battell, that he fled over the River of Thamis, and forsooke his kingdome, when he had reigned xi. yeres, and was neuer heard of afterward, whereby this kingdome of Kent was united to the kingdome of the West Saxons.

The yere 829. Wilfred Archbishop of Canterbury deceased, and was buried in Christes Church in Canterbury, when he had late 27. yeres, after whom succeeded Fleogild.

South Saxons.

Southsex the second kingdome, contained the Countiees of Southsex and Surrey, which had on the East side Kent, on the South side the Sea, on the West side Hampshire, and on the North the river of Thamis: it containeth the Diocesess of Chichester, and part of Winchester.

Ale the eight from Woden, with his threë sons Cimen, Pleneing, and Cissa, came into Bytaine with 3. ships, & landed in a place called Almenstowe, and there slew many of the Bytains, & forced the rest to make their flight into a wood which is called Andredseage. Afterward fighting with the Bytaines in a place nere unto Sparcades burne, slew many of them, and put the rest to flight.

flight. When he and Cissa his sonne after long siege, brake into the City of Andreds Cester, and slew the inhabitants from the greatest to the smallest, and so began the kingdome of Southser: he reigned xxxvi. yeres.

Cissa his sonne succeeded, he built the cite of Cissacesler now called Chichester, & named it after his owne name, he reigned, as it is said, lxxvi. yeres.

Bede.
First christened King in Southser.

Thelwulfus (whose Bede nameth Edelwach) was christened in the p<sup>ro</sup>uince of the Mercies, in the presence and at the exhortation of St. Wulfhere, who also at the font was his godfather, and in signe of that adoption, gaue him two p<sup>ro</sup>uinces, that is to say, the Isle of Wight, and the p<sup>ro</sup>uince of Manures, in the West part of England.

Wilfride the Bysshoppe came to the p<sup>ro</sup>uince of the South Saxons, vnto them did he minster the wo<sup>o</sup>rde of Faith, by the permission and great reioicing of the king. This Bysshop christened the chiefe Lordes and knightes of the Countrey: and the rest of the people at the same time, or soone after were christened by other Priestes. The Quene Ebba was christened in her Isle which was in the p<sup>ro</sup>uince of the Vicians: for shee was the daughter of Eanfride, who was Eanheres brother, there were both Christian men, and all the people. But all the p<sup>ro</sup>uince of South Saxons had neuer before that time heard of the name of G O D, nor the faith. Yet there was in that countrey a certaine Monke, a Scot boine, named Dicub, which had a very little Monastery in a place called Bosanham, all compassed about with woods and the sea, and therein v. or vi. brethren seruing G O D in humble and poore life, but none of the people there did giue themselves either to followe their life, or heare their preaching: but when Bysshoppe Wilfride came and preached the Gospell vnto them, he deliuered the people not onlie from the perill of damnation, but also from an horrible murrain of tempo<sup>o</sup>rall death, for in 3. yeres before, it had not rained in all those quarters, whereby a famine destroyed the people by heapes, in so much that diuers times 40. or 50. in a company being famished for hunger, would go together to some rocke or sea banke, and cast themselves all downe, either to be killed with the fall, or drownded in the sea: but on the same day they receiued baptisme and faith, there fell a plentifull shoure of rayne, therewith the earth florished again. This Bysshop also taught the people there to get their sustentance by fishing.

Edilwach gaue vnto Bysshop Wilfride the land of 87. tenementes, where he might place his company, the name of the place was Seolesey. In this place he founded a Monasterie, to be his Episcopall See.

Ceadwall a valiant young man of the West Saxons, being banished from this Countrey, came with an hoste of men and slew King Edilwach, wasted that p<sup>ro</sup>uince, cruelly murdered and spoiled euery where. Edilwach reigned xxx. yeres.

And soone after Ceadwall was taken out by two Captaines of the Kinges, Bertham and Anthun, which from that time did holde and kepe the Dominion of that p<sup>ro</sup>uince, the chiefe of which two, was afterwarde slaine of the same Ceadwall, (being then king of the West Saxons,) and the p<sup>ro</sup>uince subdued and brought into more greivous subiection then it was before. Againe Ine that reigned reigned after Ceadwall oppressed it with like misery & bondage many yeres, whereby it came to passe, that the people of Suffer in all this time could haue no Bpshope of their owne: but were saue (their first Bpshope Wilfride being called home to Worke) to be vnder the Dioces of the Genises which belonged to the West Saxons, as many as were in the territozie of Selsey.

After that Ceadwall had thus obtained the kingdome of the West Saxons, hee tooke the Isle of Wight also, which was so altogether giuen to the worshipping of Idoles, that he intended bitterly to banish and drive out thence all the olde native inhabitants, and to put people of his owne Countrey in their place. For though he was not yet at that time baptized, and regenerate in Christ, yet he bound himselfe with a vow, that if he tooke the Island, he would giue vnto God the fourth part thereof, and of all the pray. Which thing he so performed, that Bpshope Wilfride happening to bee there at that time, a man of his owne countrey, he offered and gaue the same vnto him, to the vse and seruice of our Lord. The said Island contained as the English did rate it, The Isle of Wight. 1200. tenements, whereof was giuen to the Bpshope, the possession of the land of thre hundred tenements, which portion the Bpshope gaue and committed to one of his Clarke named Bermen, and appointed ther to a Priest named Hildila, to minister the worde and baptisme of life to all that would bee saued. Two children of the bloud Royall, being brethren to Drualde King of that Island, being fledde into the next prouince of the Vites, where they had hidden themselves in a place called Stonestat, were betrayed and found out, whome Stonestat. the king commanded to be put to death. Which thing when a certaine Abbot named Cimerberh had heard of, whose monasterie was not far from thence, at a place called Redford, he came to the king, and desired him that if hee would Redford. needs haue the children put to death, yet they mought first receiue the Sacraments of Christs Church. The King granted his request, and then hee tooke and Catechised them in the faith of Christ and washed them with the font of Baptisme, made them sure in perfect hope to enter the kingdome euerslasting, then were they put to death by the hangman, when after this order all the prouince of great Byptaine had receiued the faith of Christ, the Isle of Wight receiued the same also: In which notwithstanding, because of the misery and state of foraine subiection, no man tooke the degree of the Ministerie and place of a Bpshope, before Daniel, who was Bpshope of the West Saxons, and of the Genises, Suffer and Hamphshire.

The situation of this Isle is ouer against the mids of the South Saxons and Genises, the sea comming betwene, of the breadth of thre miles, which sea is called Selent: in which, two armes of the Ocean Sea, that brake out from the maine South Sea about Byptaine, doe daily meete and violently runne together beyond the mouth of the Riuier Homelen, which runneth along by the Countrey of the Vites that belong to the prouince of the Genises, and so entrench into the foresaid Sea, and after this meeting and struing together of the two Seas, they goe backe and slowe againe into the Ocean from whence they came.

node, that the prouince of South Saxons, which to that date appertained to the Dioces of Winchester, where Daniel was Byschoppe, should haue a Sea and Byschoppe of their owne seuerally, whereupon Cadbert Abbot in the Monasterie of Byschoppe Wilfride was made and consecrated first Byschoppe of that Dioces.

After his death Ceolla took the Byschoppicke vpon him: after whose departure the Sea shode vacant many yeeres.

East Angles.

East Angles the third kingdome, contained the Countreies of Norfolk and Suffolke, Cambridge, and the Isle of Ely, which had on the East and North sides the Sea, on the West, Saint Edmondes Dyke, with a part of Hertfordshire, and on the South side Essex. It containeth the Dioces of Norwich and Ely.

Redwaldus the tenth from Woden, as men write: this is hee that for the favour of Edwine, killed Edelfrith king of Northumberland. The same Redwalde was by the perswasion of Edwine baptized, but in vaine, for after by his wifes counsell he fell from the faith againe, his sonne Dorwaldus in pure and incorrupted Christianitie was slaine by the heathen Rochbert. Redwaldus reigned xxx. yeeres.

Erpenwalde sonne to Redwaldus, succeeded in the kingdome of the East Angles, reigned xii. yeeres.

Sebert brother to king Carpewalde, took vpon him the kingdome, a man in all pointes learned, and most Christian, who whilst his brother was yet living, being himselfe banished into France, was there baptized and instructed in the faith, of which faith he laboured to make all the Realme partakers, as soone as hee came to the Crowne. To whose good inducement, Byschoppe Felix did greatly applie himselfe. Who when hee came from Burgundy (where hee was borne) into Bytanie to Honorius the Archbyschoppe, and had obtained licence of him to preach the worde of God vnto the foresaid East Angles, his zeale and vertuous desire proued not in vaine, for he found in that nation plenteousnesse of fruite, and encrease of people that beleued him. For he brought all this prouince vnto the faith, and workes of iustice, and in the ende to rewarde of perpetuall blessednesse, according to the abodement of his name, which in Latine is called Felix, and in our English tongue, Happie, he was made Byschop of Dunmoeke, or Dunwich, an ancient Citie in Suffolke now so decayed, and as is supposed more then halfe swallowed by in the Sea.

Liber III.

The common fame, and report of the inhabitants is, that before the towne came came to decay, there belonged therunto two and fiftie deuine houses, as Parish Churches, Pryories, Hospitales, and Chappels, as manie Abbadys, and as manie toppe Shippes. But certayne it is, as appeareth by manifest and founde recoorde which I haue seene, that euen of late time, there was within the sayde Towne fire parish Churches, two houses of Friers, an house which had bene of Templars, two Hospitales, and thre Chappelles, foure of these parish Churches are now of late swallowed vp in the Sea, and but two of them remaining on the land, to wit, Saint Peters, and all Saintes. The men of Dunwich desiring succour for their Towne against the rage of the sea, affirme that a great pce of a Forrest, sometime thereby, is deuoured and turned to the use of the Sea.

There hath bene a Pynt, manie men of that Towne can yet shew of the coines, which are sterling pence, with this inscription, Ciuitas Dunwic, twenty of which pence waighed an ounce, 12. ounces a pound Troy, and so being xx. s. in money, was both a pound in payment, & also a pound in waight, as is aforesaid. This City was gouerned by a Maior and thre Bailiffes besides inferiour officers, Felix their first Byshop fate 18. yeres, and ended his life there in Anno 649, and was buried at Seham, a place where sometime a great famous monastery stode replenished with religious persons, vnder their Abbat Warfred, which house was founded by a Noble man named Lutingus, and was wholie subuerted by the Danes: the bodie of Felix was removed to Ramseie. Byshop Felix founded a Church at Radham, which was also amongst other destroyed by the Danes. Felix also founded Scholes at Felixstowe, now called Fishkesto. After Felix succeeded Thomas, a Deacon, borne in Germany, hee fate five yeres. After him Beretgillus surnamed Bonifacius, a Kentish man borne, fate seuentene yeres. After him succeeded Bisi, who diuided the Sea into two Byshoprickes, to wit, Dunwich, and Helmbam. Thus much for Dunwich.

Felixstowe.

Sebert the king being desirous to followe the godlie order which he had seene in France, set vp Scholes in his kingdome (by the ayde of Felix, whome hee had taken out of Kent for that purpose) appointing masters and teachers to bring vp children in learning and vertue, after the manner of the Kentishmen. This Sebert was so inflamed with the loue of heauen, that leaving at the last all affaires of his Realme to the gouernement of his cousin Egrike, he became a Monk, and entred a monasterie by him builded, wherein hee bestowed his time in diuine studies, and contemplation: but the vplandish Englishmen with their old Captaine Penda, invaded his dominions, so that his people after long resistance, finding themselves too weake, they pluckt Sebert out of the monastery, and brought him against his will vnto the field, whereof the cruell heathen people he was killed, with king Egrike, and the whole armie discomfited, about the yere of Christ 652.

Anna the sonne of Ewide brother to Edwald succeeded Egrike, and was likewise slaine by the furie of Penda, Captaine of Marches, or Vplandish Englishmen, then heathen and vnchristened people, when he had reigned ninetye yeres, and was buried at Wilsburgh, in which place also was buried his sonne Firminus, but was after translated to S. Edmundsbu-rie. He had issue by his wife Herefwida daughter to Herericus the nephew of Ardwine king of Northumbers, sister to Hilda, Etheldred, Ethelburga, and Saxburg. Etheldred daughter to Anna founded the Church of Saint Peter in the Ile of Ely, in the yere of Christ 674, placing there an hundred persons of both sexes, vnder monasticall habite, and she her selfe became their first Abbesse. This Countrey of Ely is a prouince of the East English, and contayneth about two hundred households, and is compassed on eche side, as an Island round about with fens or waters: and so that many Geles are taken there, some suppose the said Ile to be called Ely: but other thinke the same to take name of Willowes, whereof the Ile aboundeth. The ground here is verie plentifull of all kinde of fruites, full of pleasant woods and vines, replenished with manie kindes of wilde beastes, fowles and fishes, &c.

Athelhere brother to Anna, succeeded, and both hee and Penda were slaine by Oswin king of the Northumbers, and that deserueth, because he had ayded Penda against his owne brother, and his kinsman.

Adelwaldus his brother succeeded him with like fortune, and left the kingdome to Aldulfus, Elohworldus and Hisberna, sonnes of the same Athelhere.

Ethelbert succeeded him: he had by his wife Laonorie a sonne named E-

Ethelbertus his son succeeded in the kingdome of the East Angles. This Eman in his youth much profited in learning, not giuen to voluptuous pleasures, but to praesers, almes, and other good workes, hee was profounde in counsell, mercifull in iudgement, and sober in speech, he was at length persuaded to marry, for increase of children, whereunto he assented. At length, Offa king of the Mercies, vsing deceit, when strength failed, for this king Ethelbert, promised him manie great things, but when he had got him into his Palace, which was at Sutton Wallis three miles from Hereford Northward vpon Luggie in Herefordshire, by the counsaile of the said Offas wife, for ambition of his kingdome, caused his head to be stricken off, by one Grim-bert a familiar to king Offa, on the eighteenth daie of Maie: his bodie was buried on the banke of the river Luggie, where now standeth the parish Church of Maudine. And so Offa vnjustly invaded and obtained the kingdome of the East Angles: but when a Virgin named Alfride, daughter to Offa, whom Ethelbert should haue married, vnderstode thereof, shee willed his seruants to haste them into their Countrey, for their Master was beheaded. And being taught by the Holy Ghost, propheted to her mother in this manner, quoth she, Thy sonne shall not liue thre yeres, and the kingdome shall be vnstable, and thou thy selfe shalt not liue in the confession of God ouer thre moneths, but shalt be possessed with a wicked spirite, and shalt eate thine owne tongue, and die an euill death: And it followed (saith mine Autho) as the Virgine had spoken: which Virgine vowed to liue a religious life, and became an Ancresse at Crowland.

When king Offa heard hereof, he repented him, and caused the bodie of Ethelbert to bee remooued to Hereford thre miles from Kenchetter, and foure miles from Sutton Wallis, where afterward ouer him was builded a goodly Church by king Milfride, which Church he endowed with great possessions, and made the same a Bishops See: since which time the Church is dedicated to the said Ethelbert.

At Sutton Wallis there appeareth yet notable ruines of some ancient and great building, and therefore great likelihood that it was sometime the mansion house of king Offa, at such time as Kencheſter ſtoode, or else Hereford was a beginning. Spaurdine village is about a mile from Sutton Wallis, and hard by is a hill whereas men ſaie Saint Ethelbert was beheaded. At this village is now a faire Church dedicated to Ethelbert. I thinke he was ſlaine at Sutton in king Offas house, but y name of Spaurdine ſeemeth to expreſſe the martyrs hill.

Kencheſter thye miles from Hemelſorth Weſtward, a mile from the banke of the river. There was a pallace of Offas (as ſome ſay) the ruines yet remaine, there hath bene found ditches and ſlojes. This towne is farre more ancient then Hereford, it ſtandeth on the ſame ſide of the river the, and thye miles or more about Hereford, and was in the Romans time, as appeareth by many things, eſpecially by antique mony of the Caſars very often found with in the towne, & in plowing there about, the which, the people there calleth dwarfe money. The compaſſe of Kencheſter hath bin by eſtimation as much as Hereford, excepting the Caſtell, the which at Hereford is very ſpacious: peeces of the walles and towres yet appeare from the foundation: the people of Hereford haue ſetcht much awaie from thence to build withall. The place where the towne was, is all ouergrowne with brambles, hazles, and like ſhrubs, there hath been found in our time Byztaine byicks, conduites for water, ſtoned pavements, peeces of golde, and other ſtrange things. To be ſhort, of the decay of Kencheſter Hereford roſe and flouriſhed.

The towne of Hereford is large and ſtrongly walled. Also having a maine Caſtell, hard by the riſe of the: the Caſtle is thought nigh as great of circuit as Windſore. The dungeon of the Caſtle is high, and ſtrong, and in the dike not farre from it is a faire ſpring called Saint Ethelberts well. With in the Caſtle in digging hath bene found bones of men of great bigneſſe, and harde by in the riſe of the banke alſo is found the like bones: the wall of the towne is compaſſed with a dike, alway filled with moriſh water deſcending into it: this water reſoſteth to the bottome of the. There be in the town ſoure pariſh Churches, one being the Cathedrall Church of a very ſtrong building. S. Ethelbert was buried there (but ſince the Welchmen deſtroyed the Towne in king Edward the Confeſſors time, his Reliques haue not bene ſene there) there be in the ſuburbes two pariſh Churches, there hath bene a cell of blacke Monkes, and two houſes of friars black and gray. Some ſay that this towne toke the name of an olde ſord or paſſage over the, not farre from the caſtle: ſome ſay it was called Fernelege, or Fernehill: and the place where the cathedrall church now is, was a chapell of our Lady called Fernelege. Thus much for Hereford.

violence done by the Mercians, untill Edmund boine in Saronie, in the Citie of Nozhenberge sonne to king Alkemon and Quene Syware. In which time reigned in East Angle a king named Offa, who minding a voyage to the holy land, took his journey through Saronie, there to visite his cousin Alkemon, and his nephew Edmond, which Edmond hee adopted to be his heire of East Angles. So we so it happened, that the saide Offa, having accomplished his voyage at the holy sepulture, and returning, deceased at Port Saint George, having before sent his ring to Edmond, making him gouernor of the East Angles, his father Alkemon provided him of men famous by experience, both in armes and gentleness; he had also clearkes circumspect & wise, to counsell him, he stufed his ships with men and victuall: which thing done, and leaue taken of his father and mother, he sailed, and landed in East England, at a place called Haydenboure, where falling on his knees, he made deuoute prayer vnto God, that his comming thither might be to him acceptable, and to all the country profitable. And not farre from thence he builded a royall Coloze, which to this day is called Hunsstone, which betokeneth swetnesse and great might: there he helde his householde nigh one yere, and then remoued to Aethelbrough, where he remained one whole yere, and learned his Psalter in the Saxon tongue, which Boke was reserued in the Reuestrie of the Monasterie of Saint Edmundsbury, till the same Church was suppressed in the reigne of King Henry the eight, as I haue bene credibly informed.

Edmond reigned xv. yeres, in whose time Hinguar and Hubba, Danish Kings, entring the prouince of the Northumbers, raged ouer all the same, and made great spoiles. Hinguar having gotten a great pray, left Hubba, and with hispany sailed into East Angle, and arriued at a certaine City thereof vnawares to the Citizens, set it on fire, and slew both man, woman and child. This wicked Hinguar took Edmond king of that prouince, in a village then called Heglisdune, nere to a wood bearing the same name, where this holie Edmond being constant in the Christian faith, was first by the Pagans beaten with bats, then scourged with whips, he still calling on the name of Iesus: his aduersaries in a rage shot him full of shafts, and then smote off his head and threw it into a bush: after which time the Angles ceased to reigne in the East Angle, but the same was possessed by Danes, till fiftie yeres after, that Edward the sonne of Etheldred did expulse the Danes, and toyned that prouince, and also the East Saxons, to his kingdome of the West Saxons.

East Saxons.

After the fourth kingdome contained Essex, Middlesex, and Hertfordshire, being bounded on the East, with the Germane Ocean, on the South with the riuer Thames, on the West with Colne, and on the North with Stowe, which at this date parteth Suffolke from Essex: it containeth the diocese of London.

Erchenwine,

Erchenwine, the eight from Woden, from whom all the Saxons derived their genealogies, first erected this Countrey to a kingdome, which neuer the lesse he held as feodarie to the kings of Kent, who were as yet the very soveraigns of the whole Countrey from Thames to Humber. And as we have specified, Voriger yielded seizon to Hengist for his deliuerie, when 50000 of the Brittaines were slaine on Salisbury plaine, and he taken prisoner.

Sledda the sonne of Erchenwine succeeded his father in the government, and so establish the state more sure, married Ricula the daughter of Ermenich king of Kent, and enjoyed his government so quietly, that he inuolued small matter to Historiographers.

Ebert the sonne of Sledda by Ricula, ruled this kingdome after his father. The second yere of his raigne, which was the yere of Christ 604 Augustine Archbishop of Canterbury, consecrated two Bishops, the one named Miletus, the other Iustus, Miletus here appointed to preach to the people of the East Saxons, which are separate from Kent with the riuer of Thames, & are fast ioyned to the East sea, whose chiefe Citie is London, a princely port towne, of many people, arriving thither by sea and land. Howe as soone as this province, by the preaching of Miletus, had receiued the word of truth.

Ethelbert king of Kent builded in the Citie of London S. Pauls Church, wherein Miletus and his successours were appointed euer after to haue their Sea. Iustus was ordained Bishop of Rochester in Kent, where king Ethelbert builded the Church of S. Andrew the Apostle, and gaue many goodly giftes to the Bishops of both Churches. Which Ethelbert in his Charter to the Church of S. Paul, hath these wordes: Edilbertus Rex, Deo inspirante, pro anima sua remedio dedit Episcopo Miletio terram qua appellatur Tillingham ad monasterium sine solatium scilicet S. Pauli. Et ego Rex Ethelbert ita firmiter concedo tibi præsuli Miletio potestatem eius habendi & possidendi, ut in perpetuum in monasterij utilitate permaneat, &c.

Saint Pauls church in London founded.

Afterward king William the first, surnamed Conquerour, by his Charter, confirming the lands giuen by the saide Ethelbert king of Kent, to the saide Church of Saint Paul in London, hath these wordes: Wilhelmus Rex Anglorum omnibus fidelibus suis Francis & Anglis de Middlesex salutem. Sciatis, quod concedo Deo & sancto Paulo suisque seruitoribus 24. hidos quos Rex Ethelbertus dedit ecclesie sancti Pauli in xta ciuitatem London, quando eam fundauit, in perpetuum liberam esse, & solutas & quietas de Dane-gildis & omnibus alijs gildis, & ab omni expeditione, & ab omni opere, & volo, & firmiter precipio, ut bene & honorifice, & in pace teneant, & ne aliquis super hoc eis iniuriam vel contumeliam faciat. Teste Lanfranco archiepiscopo, &c. Moreover, besides this confirmation aboue saide, the same king William gaue vnto the Church of Saint Paule in London, and vnto Mawrice then Bishopp thereof, the Castele of Stortford, or Stourforde in Essex, and all thinges which belonged thereto, and namely, the land which William the Deacon, and Ralphe his brother held of the king. Thus much for the foundation of Saint Pauls Church in London, founded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and confirmed by king William the Conquerour.

King Sebert, by the perswasion of king Ethelbert his uncle, and through the preaching of Miletus, hauing embraced Christianitie, was baptized by the same Miletus, and immediately, to shewe himselfe a Christian, built a church to the honour of Saint Peter, on the west side of London in a place, which because it was ouergrowne with thornes, and enuironed with waters, the Saxons at that time called it Thorney, and now of the monasterie, and west situation thereof, is called Westminster. In this place long before was a temple of Apollo (as Sulcardus writeth) which being ouerthrowne with an earthquake, Lucius then built thereon a Church for the Christians. Sebert (when he had reigned thirtene yeres) died, and was buried in the Church which he had built, with his wife Aethelgoda, whose bodies manie yeres after, to witte, in the time of Richard the second (saith Thomas Walsingham) were translated from the olde Church to the newe at Westminster, and there entered.

Serred, Seward and Sigbert, sonnes of Sebert, jointly (as it saimeth) then ruled Essex, men wickedlie giuen, irreligious, and deadly enemies to the Christian profession: who presumed contemptuously to the Table of the Lords supper, being not baptized: and because Miletus would not permit them to be partakers of the christian sacrament, they expelled him from his See at London, but shortly after Serred encountering with the West Saxons, was slaine with both his brethren by king Kinegles.

Sigbert sonne to Sigbalde, brother to Sebert, then ruled in Essex, bee by the perswasion of Oswy king of Northumbers, abandoned all superstition, and became a christian, and tooke an holie man Ced with him, who did mightily beate downe errors, and wanne many by preaching the christian religion in his dominions, whereupon Ced was by Finan consecrated Bishop of the East Saxons, and then proceeded with more authoritie in his function, ordering priestes and Deacons in all places of Essex, but especialy at Thencester and Tilberie.

This Citie of Thencester, stode on the banke of the river Pante, that runneth by Maldene in the Hundred of Dansey, but now that Citie is drowned in Pante, so that nothing remaineth but the ruines of the Citie in the said river. Tilberie standeth on the Thames side.

In the good proceedings of Sigbert, he was slaine by a kinsman of his own, vpon none other occasion, but for that he vsed too much clemencie towards his enemies, as the murderers themselves confessed.

Swidhelin son of Sexbald succeeded then in his regiment, who was baptized by Ced in a towne of the kings called Rendlesham in East England: Edelwald king of the East Angles, brother to Anna, was his godfather at the font.

Sigher then ruled with Sebba or Sebbi, although they were also vnder the allegiance of Wulshere king of the middle Englishmen. This prouince being visited with a great plague and mortalitie, Sigher with the people over whom he ruled, forsaking Christs religion, fell to Apollasse, for both the king himselfe, himselfe, and many of his people, as well of the Nobles as of the meaner sort, beganne to renue their temple, which had stood desolate, they too: shipped their goods, as though they could by that meanes haue escaped the mortalitie. But Sebbi, his companion, with all vnder him, perseuered deuotely in the faith, and he ended his life in great felicitie, as we shall hereafter declare. Wulhere the king vnderstanding part of his dominions to fall from the faith, so: to call them backe againe, sent vnto them Iarumanus the bishop of Litchfield, succesor to Trunihere, who by much labour and diligence, being a man of great vertue, painefull and zealous (as a certaine Priest waiting then vpon him, and helping him in preaching the Gospell reported vnto Bede) brought them to the faith againe, both the king and all his people, so that abandoning, and throwing downe their Temples and Altars, they opened againe the churches, confessed gladly the name of Christ, and chose rather in hope of resurrection to die, then in the filth of idolatrie to liue. Which being so brought to passe, their priestes and instructors returned home with much ioy and comfort.

Theodore Archbishop of Canterbury appointed Erkenwald to be bishop of the East Saxons in the citie of London. This Erkenwald, in the yere of Christ 677. before he was made bishop, had builded two godly monasteries, one for himselfe at Crotsey in the Ile of Crote in Surrey, by the riuer of Thames: and another for his sister Edilburge, in a place called Werching in Casser, for his sister Ethelburge she was first Abbas there. Sebbi king of the East Saxons (as is aforesaid) a man very deuout and godly, being giuen to often prayer, and charitable almes giuing, esteeming the solitary and monasticall life, before all the riches and honors of a kingdome, which kind of life he had long time before taken, & had giuen by his kingdome, had not his wife refused to be separated from him. And therefore some men thought (as it had bene often said) that a man of such a nature and well disposed minde, was more mete to be made a bishop then a king. Now when this souldier of the Ecclesiasticall kingdome had passed a xxx. yeres in his temporall raigne, at length he died: but first he admonished his wife, that then at the least they should wholly giue themselves both together to serue God, whereas they could no longer now enioy or serue the world together. Which thing, when he had with much ado obtained of her, he came to þe bishop of Londō, named Waldhere, who had succeded Erkenwald, and at his hands receiued the habite of religion, which hee had long desired, to wit, of a Monk, for at that time were Monkes in the Church of S. Paule in London, as writeth Radulphus Dediceto and other.

To this Bishop he brought a great summe of money to be bestowed and giuen to the poore, reseruing nothing at all for himselfe, but rather desiring to remaine poore in spirite for the kingdome of Heauen. And when he perceived the day of his death to be at hand, because his foresaide sickness grewe still vpon him, for the princely and hantie courage that he had, he beganne to feare least at his death, through bitter paine, he might hap, either to vtter with his mouth, or with his body do any thing that were not decent for his person, he sent for the bishop of London, where he also then continued, and desired him that at his departing out of this world, there should be no more present but him-

Seofride sonne to Sebbi, and brother to Sigheherd, reigned next successuclie, of whome I find nothing recorded of his age.

Rich. Ciceffe.

Offa the sonne of Sigheherd then ruled this prouince, hee enlarged with building, and enriched with lands the Church of Westminster, and then forsaking his wife Geneswede Pendaes daughter, lands, kinne, and countrey, he went to Rome with Kenred king of Mercia, and Edwine Byshoppe of Worcester, and there in a Monkes coule ended this life, leaving Selred to rule his country.

Suthred after Selred was slaine, reigned in Eastsex : but Egbert king of the West Saxons, the very yere that hee conquered Kent, subdued also this Suthred, & annexed Essex to his kingdome: yet London with the countrey continuing about it, came not in subiection to the West Saxons, but obeyed the king of Mercia, as long as that kingdome continued.

Sigehrike and Sigehard after ward aspired to the kingdome of the East Saxons, but with no good successe, and so that kingdome ceased.

Mercians.

Mercia the sixt kingdome and greatest of the other, contained Gloucester, Hereford, Chester, Stafford, Worcester, Oxford, Warwicke, Darby, Leicester, Buckingham, Southampton, Nottingham, Lincoln, Bedford, Huntington, and part of Hartford shires. It had on the West side, the river Dee fast by Chester, and Seuerne fast by Shyonslebery vnto Wytholw: in the East, the East sea : in the South, Thames vnto London : in the North the river Humber, and so Westward, downe to the river Merce, vnto the corner of Wyllyhall.

This kingdome of Merce in the beginning was departed into three partes, into West Mercia, middle Mercia, and East Mercia : it containeth the diocesses of Lincoln, Worcester, Hereford, Coventry and Lichfield.

Penda the sonne of Wibba, a man actiue in wars, a frantike and most wicked man, toke on him the kingdome of the Mercies, when he was fiftie yeres olde : he shooke the Cities, and disturbed the borders of the kings, that were where his owne countrey men boꝛne : hee ſlew Edwin and Oswald, kinges of Northumberland, (where Oswald was ſlaine is now ſituate the Towne of Oswaltre, which of him toke that name) he alſo ſlew Siebert, Egfride, and Anna, kinges of the Eaſt Angles, which all were of holie life and conuerſation : hee baniſhed Kenwallus king of Weſt Saxons, but in the ende, himſelfe was ſlaine by Ofwin which ſucceeded Oswald his brother, when hee had raygned thirtie yeres.

Peda the ſonne of Penda, ſucceeded in part of the kingdome which was called middle England, who comming after to Ofwine king of Northumberland, requirred his daughter Alſede to wife, which ſute he obtained, vpon condition he woulde receiue the chriſtian faith, and be baptized : and ſo hee receiued Baptiſme at the hands of Biſhop Finan, in a famous Towne of the kinges called Ad murum, by the Brits wall, twelue miles from the Eaſt Sea, from whence he returned home with 4. prieſtes, notable for learning and vertue, which ſhould inſtruct and baptize his people. Theſe preached the worde of God, and were gladly heard, thereby manie daylie, as well noble, as of the baſe ſorte, renounced their filthie idolatrie, and were baptized. Neither king Penda father to the yong Prince did wiſh and the preaching of the Goſpell in his dominion, but perſecuted ſuch as bare the names of chriſtians, and liued not accordingly, ſaying, that ſuch men were wretched which regarded not to ſerue the God in whom they profeſſed to beleue. Theſe things began thus two yeres before the death of Penda.

ing of a heathen Prince.

In theſe daies king Ofwine, after often and cruel inuaſions of the heathen tyrant Penda, forced of neceſſitie offered manie and moſt precious iewels, with an infinite ſumme of treaſure, to redeme quiet and peace to his Countrie, but the barbarous tyrant, purſuing his deadly enterpriſe, and proteſting bitterly to extinguiſh the whole nation from the higheſt to the loweſt. King Ofwine called to God for help againſt his enemies, vowing, that if he had the upper hand, his yong daughter ſhould be conſecrated to God in perpetuall virginitie, and twelue ſarme places with the land, ſhould be conuerted to the erecting of monaſteries. Then preparing himſelfe to battell, with a vertie ſmall armie, the army of the heathen reported to be thirtie fold as manie, hee overcame them : and this is to be noted as a great helpe to the Chriſtians, that whereas the field was fought nigh to the riuer Zuruent, the ſaide riuer did at that time ſo overflowe the banks and fieldes about, that in the ſight of the heathen more were drowned then perſiſhed by the ſword. And thus was king Pendaes power overcome, and himſelfe ſlaine, when he had raygned or raged cruellie thirtie yeres. This Penda (ſaith Ingulphus) had ſonnes that were moſt deuout maintainers of Chriſtian religion, to wit, Peda, Viſere, Ethelred, Marwald, and Mercelini, and daughters, Kinisburge and Kenelwith, both for holie conuerſation excelling. The ſoreſaid battell was fought by king Ofwine, in the countrey of Neſd, the thirtieenth yere of his raygne, the yere of Chriſt 659. the ſixteenth date of Nouember. Ofwyne hauing obtained this victorie, rendered due thanks therefoꝛe to God, gaue his daughter Elſede to be brought vp and conſecrated to perpetuall virginitie, and alſo the twelue poſſeſſions promiſed hee performed.

Ingulphus.

The Lady Elfrida entred the monastery of Harts-eye, to bee brought by vnder Hilda the Abbess, and after ward builded for her selfe a monastrie in a place called Strethshalt thirty miles from Poike, and was there buried.

Oswine now reigning ouer the Mercies, and ouer the South people of Englands, subdued also the Dales, for the most part, to his allegiance: he founded Lichfelde, and procured it to be a Cathedrall Church of that prouince: Dwina was first Byshop of Mercia, also of Lindesferne, for there were then so fewe Priests, that one Byshop was compelled to gouerne two prouinces. This Dwina was a Scottissh man, and gouerned the Church of Lichfield two yeere, and died at Jfepping. The seconde Byshoppe was Cellach, a Scot, who ere long lette his Byshopricke, and went to Lindesferne. The thirde was Thrumhere an Englishman, who was also Abbot of Ingethling, a monastery builded there this king Oswine was slain. The fourth was Iariman. The fift was Cedda, who was buried at Lichfield, though hee had founded an Abbey at Lindsey, in a place called Ctheare. The sirt was Winfrothus. The seueneth Sexulfus a great builder of Peterborough Abbey: after these decease, two Byshops ruled the prouince or kingdom of Mercia, to wit, Winifrede at Chester, and Heda at Lichfield, after Winifred was relected: and Hidda safe alone, and died in the yeere of Christ 721. &c. Nowe concerning the name of Lichfield, Iohn Rouse saith there was in Bytaine a great number of Christians, which hearkened to the preaching of Amphibale (instruder of Albon) martyzed and slayne in a place at Lichfelde, called Cadauerum campus, a place of dead bodies, &c. This towne, for the most part, standeth vpon a lowe and equall ground, onely the close and the cathedrall church, with a long strate, that lieth north on the bydge of the Towne, is somewhat vpon a high ground: there is no token that euer the Towne was walled: a ditch was made in a part of the Towne by Langton Byshop of Lichfelde. There hath bene a castell of auncient time, but no part of it standeth: the place of the ditch is sene, and is yet called Castel-felde. In the maine Towne, which is a faire large thing, be thre parish churches, S. Maries, a right beautifull peere of worke, in the verie market steepe, whereas was a Guilde or brotherhood, begunne about king Edward the thirde time, and since much encreased by one Heywood, Deane of Lichfield: Saint Nicholas in the Southeast ende of the Towne: Stowe Church in the East ende of the Towne, whereas is Saint Ceddes Well, a thing of pure water, where is sene a stone in the bottome, on the which (some saie) that Cedde was wont to stande and praye. At this stone Cedde had his Oratory in the time of Vlfere king of the Mercians: at which time, all the countrie about Lichfelde was a Forrest and wildernesse. There was an house of Saint Iohn in the verie South ende of the Towne, where in was a Master and Fellowes. Smith Byshop of Couentrie and Lichfelde, in king Henrie the seuenths dayes, and after wardes Byshop of Lincolne, beganne a newe foundation at this place, setting vp a Master, two Priests, and tenne pore men in an Hospitall, hee set there also a Scholemaster and an Usher to teach a Grammar schole. King Henrie the seuenth gaue vnto it an olde Hospitall called Denhall in Wyreball in Cheshire, with the landes and the impropriation of Burton Church in Wyzehall: there was an house of gray Friars in the Southwest parte of the Towne, Alexander Bpshp of Lichfield was the founder of it. There commeth a conduite of water out of an hill to the Towne, and hath two cascadelets, one in the East wall of the Friars close, and the other about the market place, besides water to serue the close and the Prebendes houses. There was a faire olde Crosse, enuironed with steppes in the Market place: Denton Deane of Lichfelde compassed this Crosse with eight faire Arches of stone, making a rounde vault ouer them for market folkes to stande vnder in, it did cost him a hundreth and thyscore poundes. The North part of Lichfield is diuided from the South part with thre pondes or lakes, whereof both the two first lying by West, are nothing so great as the thirde that lyeth by East: there bee diuers Springes in these poles, but the principall Spring is a brooke that entereth into them and feedeth them, comming from Dwe about a mile and halfe by West from Lichfield: the first westward pole is diuided from the second pole by a great maine causeway, walled on eche side with stone, and in this causeway be Arches of stone for the water to issue into the second pole: and this causeway serueth to come out of the South part of the Towne into the North. This causeway was last made by Lang on Bpshp of Lichfield. There is also a stone causeway, and an issue for the water betwixt the second pole and the third, leading out of the Towne hard to the South gate of the close of the Cathedrall Church: and on the East side of it, is a faire Mill, this causeway is little more then a quarter so long as the first. The third pole that lyeth by West, is a verie faire thing, and plentifull of fish, and goeth in length about halfe a mile or euer the whole water be drawne into a narrowe bottome, that thre milles lower goeth into Trent, by the right riue.

The Cathedrall Church of Lichfield being first erected by king Oswyne, was of later times renouated and dedicated to Saint Mary and Saint Cedde. The whole close of the cathedrall church was newly ditched and walled by Bpshp Langton, and he made one gate of a maiestie, and great strength at the West part of the close, and an other, but a lesse gate, at the Southeast part of the close: he made also the Bpshps pallace, at the East end of the close: he made Cokeshall castle, Shobozowe manour place, and the pallace by Strond at London, besides many other great actes, he was treasurer to king Edward the first. The Prebendaries in the close be very faire builded. The Choristers haue a goodly house lately builded by Bpshp Blythe. Fairewell a small priorie of Nunnes, suppressed by Thomas Wolsey Archbishop of Yorke, and giuen to Lichfield, in recompence of a pension that should haue bene giuen out of his college in Exford, was impropriate to the Choristers of Lichfield. The Librarie, at the North west part of the Cathedrall Church was erected by Thomas Haywood, Deane of Lichfield. The glorie of the Church is the worke of the West ende, that is exceeding costly and faire. There be thre pyramides or steeples of stone, two at the west ende, and one in the middell of the church. That parte of the Towne that lyeth by North the great causeway or bridge, is but one faire stræte in length. And thus much for the Citie of Lichfield: all which sprang of the Monasterie there. King Oswyne gaue to Peda sonne to Penda, because hee married king Oswynes daughter as is afore shewed, the kingdome of the South marches, divided by the riuer of Trent from the north marches.

Peda the first Christian king of Mercia.

Peda nowe king of Mercia, beeing also the first Christian king of that kingdome, beganne to plant Christianitie, throwing downe, and destroying the Idoles, and erecting Churches of Christian Religion. Among the which, hee beganne the foundation of Medeshamstede, nowe called Peterborough; but hee reigned not long, for hee was trayterouslie slaine, by the means of Alfiede his wife, in the feast of Easter in the yere of Christ 657. And king Os-wyne thre yeres after his great victorie ouer the cruell Pagan Penda, the Robilitie of the Mercians Iumin, Eaba, and Eadbert rebelled against him, aduan-cing to the Crowne Vlfere brother to Peda.

Vlfere brother to Peda, earnestly preferred christianity, which his brother had begunne, but he was the first (saith William of Malmesburie.) that through the sinne of Symonie, solde the Bishopricke of London vnto Wyna.

Worcester.

I reade in a Legar Booke of the Monasterie of Peterborough, that Vlfere king of Mercia, remaining at his Castell of Worcester in Staffordshire, and vnderstanding that his sonne Vlfade, had led his brother Regin to Chad (vnder colour of hunting) by whome they were both instructed in the Christian faith, and had receiued Baptisme, hee by perswasion of Werebode, goeth to the Quatre of the Holie man, where finding both his sonnes in deuout contemplation, hee killed them with his owne handes, whose Bodies Ermenhelde the Quene their mother did burie in a Sepulture of stone, and in proceesse of time, caused a Church of stone there to bee builded: which place was after called Stones, by reason of the stones which the multitude brought thither for the building thereof, when they came to frequent the place.

But Vlfere after, repenting thereof, destroyed all the Temples of the Idoles, and in place of them did build Churches and Monasteries, among the which hee bestowed great cost on Medeshamstede, enriching it with large pos-

Medewell.

This Church standeth in the Prouince of Gertwyr such as inhabite the Fennes, and make not bee come vnto, except on the East side: on the South side whereof doth run the Riuer of Penne. in the midst of the which course is a place, as it were, a Whirlepoole, which is so deepe and colde, that in the Summer none can swimme or dree to the bottome, and yet it is neuer frozen in the Winter: for (as they saie) there is a fountaine, out of the which issueth water, which place the Ancients did name Medewell, of which the Monasterie built hard by was called Medeshamstede, which the thre brethren, Peda, Vlfere, and Ethelred, the sonnes of Penda, with their sisters, Kenesburg, and Keneswith, and king Oswyne did build from the foundation. But Peda in the yere of Christ 675. with the deuout multitude, by the help of Sexulfus first Abbot there, began this monastery, & laid y foundation there, of such stones as 2. yoke of oxen could scarce draw one of them, which stones were sene when the monasterie monastery was burned. This Church was destroyed by the Danes, as all other monasteries were, & so remained 96. yeres, til the time that Ethelwald bishop of Win. coming into a place called Undal or Dundal, begā there to make a new foundation, but after coming to Spedishamsted, which he found desolate, by the helpe of king Edgar and Adolphus his Chancellour, hee did newe repaire the monastery there: and the monastery at Dundal was made a parish church. In Anno 1117. this monastery of Spedishamsted with the whole Towne was burnt, but in the yere after begunne to bee newe builded by Abbot Iohn from the foundation, and the Monkes entred againe in the yere 1140. King Vikere raigned 17. yeres, and was buried at Lichfelde: Eiminelde his wife, after his decesse became a Nun at Cly, vnder her mother Sexburg.

Ethelred brother to Vikerus succeeded in the kingdome of the Mercians: he obtained a Bishops See to be in the citie of Worcester: Bosellus was first Bpshp there: Egwinus was the second. This Egwinus, by the helpe of Kenredus king of the Mercies founded the monastery of Cutham, in a place then called Couetham, of the Shepherdes field and house, purchased by the said Bpshp. The Towne in the Saxons time was called Hothesholme. About the same time two Noblemen Odo and Dodo founded the priory of Tetwelsburte. Also Osricke Duke of Gloucester founded the monasterie of Gloucester, then for nuns: since the same is a Bishops See. Ethelred became a Monke at Bardoney in Lincolneshire, when he had raigned 30. yeres.

Kinredus sonne to Wolfenus, in the v. yere of his raigne went to Rome, & became a Monke in the Church of S. Peter the Apostle, where he continued in fasting, praise, and almes giuing, untill his dying daie.

Elred the sonne of Ethelred, who as he was maruellous in prowesse against Cina of the West Saxons, so was he miserable by untimelie death, for hee raigned not past 8. yeres, and was buried at Lichfield.

Ethelbald raigned in continuall peace many yeres, and then by the procurement of Beruredus, was slaine of his owne subiectes. Unto this Ethelbald Boniface, the second Bpshp of Atriche in Holland, after Archbshp of Penz upon the Rhene an Englishman borne, who was afterward martyred, for the profession of Christ and his holie Gospell, sent an Epistle, of the which I will here set downe a pce to bee seene, for that it sheweth partlie the state of that time then present, and serueth for example in time to come.

This most deere Lord, and to be preferred in the loue of Christ aboute all other kings of England, Edaldus, Boniface Archbshp, the Germane Legate, perpetuall health of charitie and loue in Christ. We acknowledge before God, that wee did reioice to heare of your prosperitie, your sayth and god workes: and wee bee sozry when we heare any thing that goeth against you, eyther in successe of warre, or in danger of your soule, for we haue heard, that you forbiddeth and robbery, that you loue peace, defende the widowe and the poore, for the which wee giue God thanks: but in that you refuse lawfull marriage; which if it were to the preferring of chastitie, it were commendable: and sith you wallow in lecherie and adultery with Virgins consecrate to God, it is both shamefull and damnable, for it doeth confounde you renoune, both

thelbald.

Aduoutrie among Infidels punished by Death.

before GOD and man, placing you among Idolators, because you violate the Temple of GOD. Wherefore my deare sonne repent, and remember how filthy a thing it is, that thou, who by the gift of God reignest ouer so many nations, shouldst to the great displeasure of God, make thy selfe a bondslau to thine owne fleshly lust. We haue heard also, that the more part of noble men and people of the Mercians, by thine euill example, haue lost their lawefull wiues, and haue defiled the wiues of other, and also Virgins, which, howe farre it differeth from all good order and honestie, let the Lawes of strange Nations teach you: for in the ancient Countrey of the Saxons (where was no knowledge of GOD) if either a maide in her fathers house, or being married to an husband, were become an aduoutresse, she should be strangled by her owne hand closed to her mouth, and the corrupter should be hanged vpon the pit where the aduoutresse was buried. If she were not so used (her garments being cut awaie downe to the girdlestræde) the chaste Patrones did scourge and whippe her, and picke her with kniues, and so was sent from Towne to Towne, where other fresh and new scourgers or whippers did meete and whip her, untill they had killed her. Likewise the Comedians, who are the most uncleane kinde of people, had this manner of vsage with them, that the husband being dead, the woman, together with the dead body should cast her selfe headlong into the fired stacke or pile of wood prepared for the burning of their bodies. If therefore the Gentiles (not knowing God) had so great zeale to chastitie, how much more (my deare sonne) is it to be required at thy handes, who art a Christian and a King? Haue therefore compassion of thine owne soule, and spare the great number of the people, that by thy fatherly example yet meate beware to offend God, for whose soules thou shalt giue an account. Consider also, that if the English Nation, despising lawfull matrimonie, doe encrease by aduoutrie, (as the Frenchmen, Italians, and also the verie Pagans doe cast in our teeth and vphrayde vs withall,) of such confusions and copulations, shall spring by a peackish dastardlie people, which shall despise God, and with their wicked qualities vndoe the Countrey, as it came to passe to the Burgundians, the people of Prouance, and the Spaniards, whome the Saracens haue manie yeres assaulted for their sinnes which in times past they had committed. Besides this, it is tolde vs, that you take away priuiledges of Churches, and thereby giue euill example vnto your noble men to doe the like: but I pray you remember howe terrible vengeance God toke vpon the kings your predecessors, which committed such offences as we rebuke you for.

A wicked spirite came vpon Solredus your predecessor, which was a defiler of Virgins, and a breaker of Ecclesiasticall Priuiledges, for sitting roially among his Barons at a dinner, the Diuell plucked awaie his soule without confession of his sinnes. The Diuell also drewe in such a rage, Ofredus king of the Northumbers, which was guiltie of the same crimes, that with a vile death he lost both kingdom and life in his lustie young age. Also Charles king of Fraunce which ouerthrowe Churches, and altered the Church money to his owne vse, was consumed with a long torment and fearefull death.

It followeth therefore (my deare beloued sonne) that with fatherlie and earnest prayers wee beseech you, that you will not despise the Counsell of your fathers which diligentlie doe admonish your Highnesse, for nothing is more commodious to a good king, then willingly to amend such faults when hee is warned of them, as Salomon saith, Who so loueth Discipline, loueth himselfe. Therefore (my deare sonne) declaring our aduice, we beseech you by the liuing God, by his sonne Iesus Christ our Lord, and by his holie spiritte, that you will remember howe transitorie this present life is, and howe short and momentane the pleasure of this fleshie flesh is, and how vile and shamefull a thing it is, that man shall leaue euill examples to his posteritie for euer: beginne therefore to frame your life in better waies, and amend the errors of your youth, that you may obtaine praise with men in this life, and eternall glorie in the life to come: Take with your Highnesse well to fare, & to encrease in all godnesse.

Whereouer, the same Bonifacius sent an Epistle of the like tenor vnto Cuthbert Archbishop of Canterbury, adding thereunto, that he should rebuke the Clerkes and Runnes for their finenes, and pompe of apparel and garments. He also willed Cuthbert not to maruaile that he medled with other mens matters, nor to thinke it no part of his charge, to deale with the English Nation, but to vnderstand that Gregorie Bishop of Rome had bounde him, by the Sacrament whise receiued, to let him vnderstand, of the maners and vsages of the Nations about him: which indede (he saide) he woulde doe, if his gentle admonition toke not good successe.

The Epistle of Boniface to Ethelbalde toke such effect, that Ethelbalde forthwith sending to the Archbishop Cuthbert, and other his Cleargie and nobilitie, by their counsell, amongst other things he caused to be published, as followeth:

I Ethelbalde King of the Mercians, foreséeing that I ought to prouide for the kingdome euerlasting, and the remedie of my soule, that I may deliuer it from the bondage of sinne. And forasmuch as Almightie GOD, by his mercifull clemencie, without anie of my deserts going before, hath giuen me the Scepter of the kingdome, gladly therefore will I render vnto him of the things which he hath giuen me, and for this cause I giue this gifte by my life time.

That all Churches of my kingdome shall be discharged of all manner of tribute, in wozkes, and burdens, except it be in the building of Towers, Castles, and Bridges, which cannot be released vnto any. Whereouer, that seruitours of Monasteries and Churches, shall haue their owne proper libertie in the profite of woods, & of fieldes, and shall not be bound to giue any reward vnto the King or Princes, except they will, but shall be free that they maie serue God, &c.

This Countell or conuocation was holden by Cuthbert the Archbishoppe of Canturburie, and the other Bishoppes and Prelates, in the yere of our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ, seven hundredeth, fourtie, and seven, and was in the thre and thirties yere of Ethelbalde king of the Mercians, who then was present with his Princes and Dukes, where when there was assembled out of diuers provinces of Brytaine, Bishops and other spiritual persons, and the writings of Pope Zacharie were read in two partes, therewith he did admonish the people of England to liue more continently, and threatened that the despisers of his commandements should be excommunicated: whereupon the Bishops and Prelates agreed vpon certaine Articles, as followeth:

That the Prelates should liue more carefully and warne their subiects.

That they should liue in one peaceable mind, although they liued separate in bodies.

That euery yeere they should visite their parishes and charge.

That euery one in his iurisdiction warne the Abbots and Monkes to liue orderly, and the Bishops not to oppresse their subiects, but to cherish them.

That they also see that the Monasteries, the secular men that can not be taken away, be decently ordered.

That none be admitted to orders, vnlesse his life before be well examined.

That the reading of holy Scriptures be frequented in the Monasteries,

That the Priests be not buyers and sellers in worldly affaires.

That the Priests receiue no reward for baptizing of children and other Sacraments.

That they learne and teach in English the Lordes prayer and the Crede.

That al do finish their ministry after one & y same maner in their churches.

That they sing seruice in the Churches with sober voice.

That the solemnization of our Lord, and the byrth daies of Saintes be solemnized at one and the same time.

That the Sunday be kept honourably holy.

That intercession be made for kings and rulers, &c. In all xxx. Articles.

Ethelbald founded the Monasterie of Crowland, and because the marish of this Crowland, as the very name declareth (for it signifieth crudy ground and myrie) was not able to beare a stone building, the forenamed king caused many and mighty piles of Oake to bee dyuen into the ground, and commanded hard earth to be brought thither nine miles off by water in boates, from the higher ground, and to be mingled with the marish, and in this sorte he laid the foundation, and finished the Church of stone.

When Ethelbald had reigned xli. yeres, fighting against Cuthred, in the war not prudentlie begun, vpon Segiswald, or Secondone (as some say) thre miles from Tamworth, he was slaine of the tyrant Barred, and was buried at Kipendine or Kipon, at that time a famous monasterie.

Eraredus the murderer of Ethelbald did nothing worthy the remembrance, but was slaine by Offa, and had an end mete for a traitor.

Offa nephew to Ethelbald succeeded: hee toynd battell with Kineulfus King of the West Saxons, and got the victorie. He sent for Ethelbert king of the East Angles, promising great things by flatterie, but when he had gotte him to his Pallace, hee caused him to be beheaded, and then vniustlie invaded the kingdome of the East Angles, as is shewed in the raigne of the East Angles.

He caused the reliques of S. Alban to be taken up, and put in a Shrine adorned with golde and precious stones, and builded there a Princely Monasterie, endowing the same with lands by his Charter, dated the yeere of Christ, 793. in the yeere of Offas raigne, 33. in the famous place called Celchyth, with the witnesse of himselfe, his sonne Egfride, 9. kings, 15. Bishops, 10. Dukes, &c.

He founded the Abbey of Bath.

He translated the Archbishops Sea to Lichfield.

He made a Dike betwene Wales and the Kingdome of the Mercies, which ditch extendeth by South from the partes about Wysslow, over the mountains of Wales, and so North toward Flint, and under a hill of coale, even to the mouth of Dee, or the North Sea, which dike is yet to be seene, and manifestlie appeareth in diuers places. He raigned xxxix. yeeres, and died at May, and was buried in a Chappell which then stode on the banche of the River Use, without the towne of Bedforde. Which Chappell with the Sepulture of the king, the said River hath swallowed up, whose tombe of lead (as it were some phantastieall thing) appeareth often to them that seeke it not, but to them that seeke it (saith Rouse) it is insensible.

Egbertus or Ecfride his sonne raigned one yeere. Alcuine writ to Osbert of the Mercians, that the noble young Ecfride died not so soone for his owne faultes, but because his father was a great shedder of blood.

Kenulfus, Nephewe in the fifth degreé unto Penda, warred on the Kentish Saxons, punished their Countrey very sore, and caried away bound their king Egberthus, but not long after, when he had builded a church at Winchelscombe, on the day of the dedication thereof, he deliuered him, declaring a worthy example of clemencie. He founded the church of S. Ethelbert in Hereford, and raigned xxxiii. yeeres.

Northumbers.

The first kingdome was of the Northumbers, which contained Lancashire, Dorsetshire, Cumberland, Westmerland, Northumberland. It had on the West the Sea, by South the River of Humber, and so downeward toward the West by the endes of the Shires of Nottingham and of Darby, unto the River of Merce, & hath the Diocesses of Dorke, Durham, and Carlisle.

At the beginning, it was devided into two kingdomes, Bernitia, and Deira. Bernitia stretched from Edenborough Frith to Tine: and Deira, from Tine to Humber, but these two were shortly united.

When Hengist had established himselfe in Kent, he sent his brother Otha, and his sonne Ebusam to possesse the North partes of Brytaine, where many times they put the men of that prouince to flight, and for the space of ninetie nine yeres, they and their successours ascribed to themselves the names of Dukes, and bare themselves vnder the kingdome of Kent, but in the yere of Christ. 547. the yere after Hengistes death 60. that Dukedome was changed into a kingdome.

Alla his successor of the same kindred, but by another line, strongly advanced his kingdome x. yeres.

In his time, children of Northumberland were caried to bee solde in the Market at Rome, where when the Citizens beheld them, and wondred at their comelienesse and beautie of face, amongst other, Gregory the Archdeacon of the Apostolicall seate being one, asked of what Nation they were, unto whome it was answered, that they were the children of English men, of the prouince of Deires, and subiect to Alla their king, but were Paimims, whereunto Gregory said, they shall be taught to sing Alleluia there, during the raigne of Alla ouer the Deires.

Ethelfride, brother to Ethelricus, made greater spoile of the Brytaines, then all the kings of the Angles, and vnpeopled and subdued more of their Countries, and made the same tributary and habitable for Englishmen: wherefore Aadan king of the Scots being greatly moued with this happie successe came against him with a mighty army, but was overcome and put to flight of a few Saxons, which battell was fought by Ethelfrich, in a place called Degfastan, fallen, in the xi. yere of his raigne, and in the first yere of Phocas the Emperour, which was the yere of Christ, 603.

This king also not long after this time, leuyed a newe power, and according as Augustine the Archbyschop of Canterburie had before spoken, marched toward the Citie of Legions, which of the Bytaines is called Cairlegion, and there first slew 1200. Monks, assembled to make prayer unto God, for the good successe of their Souldiours in the battaile: and afterwarde he ouerthrew the whole power of the Bytaines host. He was slaine by Redwald king of the East Angles in a battaile nere vnto the Riner which is called Zole, in the yere of Christ 616. when he had reigned xxviii. yeres.

In Anno 626. Paulinus being the thirde Byschoppe of Rochester, was constituted by Iustus then Archbyschoppe of Canterburie, to be Byschoppe ouer the Northumbers, and sent by Eadbald to Edwyne the king of that nation, with his wife, being the daughter of king Ethelbert, and sister of the said king Eadbald.

A certaine desperate fellow, named Eomer, was sent vnto king Edwyne, by Guicheline king of the West Saxons, who came vnto him on Easter daye, and hauing a naked weapon vnder his garment, assailed the king, but Lilla his seruaunt thrust himselfe before the stroke, yet notwithstanding the king was with that stroke wounded through the bodie of his faithfull seruant.

The same night the Q. his wife was deliuered of a daughter, which vppon Whitsonday next after, was the first that was baptized of Paulinus the Byschop, and named Eanfleda.

In the yere of Christ 628. Edwyne the most mightie king of the Northumbers, and his people, receiued the word of God, at the preaching of Paulinus the Byschop: this was done in the xi. yere of his raigne, and in the 230. yere after the arrivall of the Angles in Bytaine.

Edwyne gaue vnto Paulinus a Byschoppes See in the Citie of Yorke, and began the Cathedraall Church of S. Peter there, which Church was after finished by king Oswald his successor, after this, in encreasing of the Christian faith and heauenlie kingdome, his earthlie possessions did wonderfullie encrease, for he first of all the Angles brought Bytaine whollie vnder his subiection, sauing the kingdome of Kent.

Edwyne in the 17. yere of his raigne, and the 48. of his age, was slaine in a battaile which he fought at Headsfelde, with the most valiant Paganim Penda king of the Mercies, and Ceadwalla king of the Bytaines. Paulinus the Byschoppe builded the great Church at Lincolne. In the raigne of king Edwyne, such was the peace and tranquillitie through all Bytaine, which waite soener king Edwines dominions lay, that a weake woman might haue walked with her new borne babe ouer all the Island without anye damage. Moreover for the refreshing of waifaring men, he ordained Cups of yron or brasle, to be fastned by such cleare Welles and Fountaines as did runne by the waies side, which cuppes no man durst touch further then to his owne present vse and necessitie, for the loue and good will they bare to their Prince, who was for the time of his raigne so honoured and loued, that the triumphant banners were borne before him, not in warre onely, but in peace to, where soeuer he went abroad.

After the death of Edwine, the kingdome of Northumberland was againe diuided.

633 O Sriche sonne of Elfrike, who was Edwines vnckle, succeeded in the gouernance of Deira. And Eanfride the son of Ethelfride, ruled the Bernicians: but both these forsaking the Christian profession, wherein they were instructed, yielded themselves to be defiled with the filth of Idolatry: but this Apostasie was reueaged by Cedwall king of the Brytaines, who slew them both, & with tragicall slaughter spoiled Northumberland.

634 O Swald brother to Eanfride, then gouerned this kingdome, who with a small armie ouercame the Brytaines, and slew Cedwall their king at Deniscburne. He sent for Aidan a Scot to aduance the Christian Religion among his people, assigning to him the Isle of Lindisfarne or holie Island, for his Sea. He greatly enlarged his kingdome, reconciled the Deirians and Bernicians, which did deadly hate one another: And when he had reigned vntill pæres, was slaine in a cruell battell at Maserfelde, by Penda king of Mercia, and canonized a Saint.

642 O Swine brother to Oswald, succeeded: he buried the head and armes of Oswald, which Penda commended to be hanged vpon poles. His gouernment was greatly disquieted by inuasion of the Mercians, rebellion of his owne son Aelfride, and insurrection of Adilwald sonne to Oswald. He murdered Oswy, the sonne of Ofrike, who ruled Deira, being traitterously deliuered vnto him at Ingethling, where afterward a Monasterie was created. But at length he deliuered his Countrey from foraine inuasion, banquished the Mercians with Penda in a fought fielde, nere the riuer Felnet, brought them to his subiection, and caused them to be instructed in the Christian faith.

He builded a Church among the Mercians called Lichfelde, and procured the same to be a Bishops see, in Anno, 657.

Duina was first Bishop there of Mercia, and also of Lindesierne: for there were then so fewe Priests, that one Bishoppe was compelled to gouerne two Provinces. King Oswine ended his life quietly, when he had reigned xxxij. pæres.

670 E Ghide his lawefull sonne, then inherited Northumberland: he deposed Wilfride of the Bishopricke, and appointed two Bishops ouer the Northumbers. Mildred, otherwise called Eheldred, his wife would by no meanes accompany with her husband, but continued a Virgine, and after he had bin married twelue pæres, tooke at the handes of Wilfride the batle and habite of a Nunne, and built the Monasterie of Ely, where she was Abbesse.

Egfride her husband fought a battell with Edilfride king of Mercia, but after they were reconciled by Theodore the Bishop. Then turning his power against Ireland, he sent Berce thither, who miserably destroyed the selp people.

West Saxons.

The seauenth kingdome was of the West Saxons, which contained the Countreies of Barkeshire, South-hampton, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall, and hath Diocesses, Bath and Wells, Sarisburie, and Excester: hauing on the East side Southser, on the North side Thames, on the South and the West the Sea Ocean.

This kingdome, although it toke beginning long after the first comming of the Saxons, yet the same endured longest, and overcoming all the other kingdomes, brought them againe to one Monarchy.

Cerdic, the tenth from Woden, with his sonne Kenrike, and other Saxons in five shippes, in Anno Christi, 499. landed in Bytaine, at a place called Cerdikeshore, and slew Natanleod king of the Bytaines, and slew thousand men, of whose name the Countrey as farre as Cerdikeshord, was called by the name of Natanleod. From thenceforth hee kept the Bytaines in great quiet, for they thought not god to stirre, where they wanted hope to preuaile.

He caused the brazen Image of Cadwaline king of the Brytains to be thowne dolone, and this land no more to bee called Brytaine, but Angla or England. He was crownded at Winchester.

In the 33. yere of his raigne the Danes arrived at Lindesferne, and fought with the Englishmen at Carham, where two Bishops, two Earles, & a great number of the English people were slaine. Two yeres after the Danes arrived in West Wales, where Egbricht overcame them at Pengisfendon. In Anno 832. the Danes spoyled the Isle of Shepey in Kent, and yet were they expelled out of the Isle of Thanet. He tooke to wife Osburge his Butlers daughter, and after her Ludich, daughter to the king of France, and had by his first wife 4. sonnes, which were kings after him.

In his time there came a great army of the Pagan Danes with 350. ships into the mouth of Thamis, and so to London, spoyled it, and put to flight Beorhtulf King of Mercia, with all his power which came to bid them battaile: Then the Danes went with their armie into Southy, where Adhelulfus with his sonne Adhelbald, and a great armie came against the foresayde Danes, and at a place called Aolea they fought a cruell battell, where in the most part of the Danes were slaine.

The same yere Adhelfane the sonne of Adhelfus, and Calchere the Earle slew a great army of the Pagans at Sandwich in Kent, and tooke nine of their shippes.

Adhelulfus sent his sonne Alfride to Rome with a great number of noble men and other, at which time Pope Leo confirmed the sayd Alfride, and tooke him to his son by adoption, and also consecrated him king.

Athelbrict reigned five yeres, and was buried at Shirborne. Etheldred brother to Adhelbrict, received the kingdome of the West Saxons. In the first yere of his raigne, a great Haup of Pagans came into England, and remained all the winter in the kingdome of East England.

The Pagans departed out of Northumberland, came to Nottingham, and there wintered, but Beorde gathering a great armie against them, strengthened besides with Etheldreds power king of the West Saxons, forced them to leave Nottingham, and to go back againe to Forke, where remaining til winter was passed, they then passed over by Boate into Lindsey, and coming by to Humberstane, spoiled the whole Countrey, they destroyed the most famous and auncient Monasterie of Bardney, slaying all the Monkes without mercie, they ranging the Countrey, slew the Abbot and Monkes of Croyland, and fiered their Church, with the houses belonging to the Monasterie. At Medishamstede or Peterborough, they made the like slaughter, hanoche, and spoile, and so proceeding toward Huntingdon, praying and spoling the Countrey, euen unto Grantbridgeshire, and to the house of Funs in the Isle of Ely, where they murdered all, as well women as men. Thus entering into East Angle, they slew the most valiant Earle Walketulus, and all his companie that resisted. The king also of the same prouince, holie Edmond they took, bound him to a stake, shotte him full of Arrowes, and strake off his head, by meanes whereof they possessed all east England, and sojourned there all the winter.

The yere 871. the said army of the Danes came to Reading a towne of the kinges situate on the South side of the Riuer Thamis in Barkeshire, and there two of their Carles with a great power rode forth to spoyle the Coun-tris,

trie, in the meane time, the other cast a trench betwene the Thamis and Cinnun or Kynet, on the right side of the same Tolone, with whom Ethelwolfe Earle of Warkeſhire did meete in a place called Engleſfield, (or field of the Engliſhmen) where one of the Carles being ſlaine, and the reſt chaſed awaie, the Chriſtians obtained the victorie.

The Chriſtians within 4. daies fought a battell with the Paganes, in Aſſendune, but the Paganes divided themſelves into two battells, for then they had two kings, which when the Chriſtians ſaw, they likewiſe divided their army into two companies.

It was determined that king Ethelred with his battell, ſhoulde go againſt the two Pagan kings with their battell, and that his brother Aelfred with his armie ſhould ſet on al the Pagan dakes and their army. All things thus ordered, when the king tarried long in his prayer, and the Paganes being readie prepared, came to Chipenbane where the battell was pitched, Aelfred ſeeing hee muſt either retire, or ſet on his enemies beſore his brother did come, he ſtraightwaies ſet upon them, though the place of battell was unequal, for the Pagans had gotten the higher ground, and the Chriſtians brought their battell from the valley. There was in that place one onellie thorne tree, verie ſhort, about which tree the battells met and joined, where when they had a long time fought, Hubba one of the kings, 5. Carles, and many thouſands mo of the Paganes being ſlaine, the other were chaſed.

A great heape of ſtones was laide copped by where Hubba was buried, and the place called Hubbeſtow.

This being done, king Etheldred and his brother Aelfred together after gathered their power againe to fight with the Pagans at Baſing, where after a long and ſore battayle, the Paganes had the victorie.

After this battayle, came another armie of Paganes from beyond Seas, and loyned with the firſt.

When king Etheldred had reigned 6. yeeres, he was ſlaine of the Paganes at Whittingham, & buried in the monaſtery of Minburne, with this Epitaph:

Aelfred being in Warkeſhire, at a village called Wanting, the 4. ſon of Aethelwolfe, receyved the gouvernement of the whole Realme, and within one moneth after, with a very ſmall number fought a ſharpe battell againſt the whole armie of the Paganes, in a place called Wilton (which lyeth on the Southſide of the River Wiſſy, of which River the whole ſhire taketh his name) and after they had fought a great part of the daie, the Pagans fledde, but ſeeing the ſeiveneſſe of them that purſued, they ſet themſelves in battaile againe, and got the field.

The next yere, at Ripendune: they constrained Burgoredus king of Mercies, to flee beyond the seas, who went to Rome, where he died, and was buried in the ſchole of the Saxons.

The Pagans ſubduing the whole kingdome of the Mercies, which they committed to Ceonulfus: The next yere one part of 5 Pagans wintered in Northumberland neere to the River Tine, ſubdued the whole Countrey: the other part went with Guthram, Osketellus, and Amandus, three kings of the Pagans, to Grantbridge, and wintered there.

Exceſter.

The yere ſollowing, the Pagans going from Cambridge in the night, entered the Caſtel of Warham, where there was a Monaſterie of Nuns, ſituate betwene two rivers Fraſe and Trent, in the Countrey called in the Saxon Thornſeta, a moſt ſure ſeat, except the Weſt onely, where it ioyneth to the land, with whom king Aelfrede made a league that they ſhould depart his kingdome, but contrary to their othe, they rode into Deuonſhire, to Exceſter, and there wintered.

Hinguar and Halfdene with 23. ſhips, came out of Northwales, where they had wintered, and like fierce Wolves had ſhed much Chriſtian blood: ſetting fire to diuers Abbeies, and made them equall with the ground, neuer kingdome or countrey ſuffered greater calamity, at the hands of any nation, then did the Engliſh, eſpecially the Honkes and religious women, for them they burnt in their houſes, or otherwiſe tormented them to death.

The next yere 120. of the Pagans ſhips were drowned at Suanaung: And king Aelfrede purſuing an armie that went by land to Exceſter, toke of them pledges, and alſo an oth to depart with all ſped.

In the yere ſollowing the Danes came to Chippingham, a mannoz of the kings, ſituate on the left ſide of Wilthire, and there wintered, compelling many of the Weſt Saxons to leaue their Countrey and to go beyonde the ſeas: the reſt that remained they ſubdued. King Aelfrede himſelfe was oft times brought into ſuch miſery, that none of his people knew where he was become. On a time being forced to hide himſelfe with a Cowheard in Somerſetthire, as he ſate by the fire, preparing his bowe and ſhaftes, the Cowhardes wiſe baking bread on the coales, threw the kings bowe and ſhaftes aſide, and ſaid, thou fellow why doeſt thou not turne the bread which thou ſeeſt burne, thou art glad to eate it ere it be halfe baked. This woman thought not that it had bin king Aelfred, who had made ſo manie battels againſt the Danes, and gotten ſo manie victories. For God did not onely vouchſafe to giue him victorie ouer his enemies, but alſo to be wearied of them in the ſight of his owne people, to the end he ſhould know there is one God of all, to whome all knees ſhall bow, and in whoſe handes the hearts of kings conſiſteth. The brother of Hinguar and of Healden, who had wintered in Mercia, and had made great ſlaughter

of the Christians, sayled with 23. ships into Deuonshire, where doing great mischief, he and the most part of his people were slaine, the rest escaped by flying to their ships. In this battel among many rich spoiles was taken a banner or ensigne called Reafan, which among the Danes was had in great estimation, for that it was imbroidered by the three sisters of Hinguar and Hubba, the daughters of Lodbroke. King Aelfred made a castell in Aethelingei, from thence he went to Petram Egebrichti, which is on the East side of the chase called Sal nudum, in Latine Silua magna, the great wood: there met with him all the inhabitants of Hampshire, which when they sawe the king, reioyced as though he had been risen from death to life.

The king with his armie went to Echandune & fought against the Pagans where he made great slaughter, and pursued the rest to their Castell, who after short daies desired peace, gaue pledges and toke oth to depart this realme: and Gythram their king receiued baptisme hard by Ethelesingcy, in a place called Alce, whom Aelfrede receiued to be his God-sonne.

In the yere 879. the Pagans went from Chipnan to Strencester, & there remained one yere after. The same yere a great army of Pagans came from beyond the Sea, and wintered at Fullanham hard by the Riuer of Chamis.

The next yere, the Pagans went from Cirestres to the East English, denuding that Countrey among them, and there inhabited. The Pagans that wintered at Fullanham, went into East France.

In the yere 885. an army of Pagans came into Kent, and besieged the citie of Rhoseceaster, which lyeth on the East side of the riuer Medowege, and beseye the gate of the same citie they made a strong Castell, but Aelfrede with a great army chased them to their ships.

The next yere Aelfrede restored, and honorably repayzed the Citie of London (after it had been among other Cities destroyed with fire, and the people killed by,) he made it habitable againe, and committed it to the custodie of his son in law Adhered Earle of the Mercies, vnto whom before he had giuen his daughter Ethelseda. And now vnto king Aelured, all the English, Mercians, Kentishmen, South and West Saxons (which before were in captiuitie vnder the Pagans) willingly came and submitted themselves.

In the yere 892. the great armie of the Pagans, came from the East kingdome of France vnto Adbon, and from thence with 250. ships into Kent, arriving in the month of the Riuer Limene, which riuer runneth from the great wood, which is called Andreads Weald, from whose mouth foure miles into the same wood they drew their ships, where they destroyed a Castell, and fortified another more strong, in a place called Apultrens, now Apuldor. This wood was from the East to the West. 120. miles in length and more, in breadth 30 miles.

The yere following, the Citie of Porke was taken by the Normans, but Seber the Bpshp, by Gods prouision escaped.

Fernham

The same yere also Aelfred fought against the Normans at Fernham, in Kent, in the parish of Aelfstord, where he slew them, wounded their king, and chased the remnant through the Thames into Caister, whereby many of them were drowned, they which escaped fled to an Island called Breklesep, situate in a streame of the Riuer Colne.

Aelfrede hearing that a great number of the Pagans were arrived at Exanceastre, he toke with him a great armie, and by battaile overcame, and chased them awaie.

In the meane season Adhered Earle of the Mercies, and the Citizens of London with other came to Beauflete, & besieged the Castle of the Pagans, and brake into it, where they toke exceeding rich spoiles of gold, siluer, horses, and garments, among which was taken the wife of Hastings and his two sons, which were brought to London, and presented to the King, who commanded them to be restored againe. But Hastings came againe into Beauflete, and repayed the Castle, which they had broken downe. From thence hee went to Seabridge, and there builded a strong Castle: there was ioyned vnto him the armie that remained at Apulzane, and other that came from the East English, and from the Northumbers, who altogether spoiled and robbed, till they came to the banke of Seuerne, and there at Bultingatune, they made a strong towne, but by Adhered Earle of the Mercies, and other, they were besieged, and shortly through famine forced to come out, where many on both sides were slaine, but the Christians had the victorie.

In the yere, 895. the Pagans wintered in a little Isle called Merfig, in the East part of Essex, situate in the sea, and y same yere they sayled by the Riuer of Thames, after by the Riuer of Algea, and twenty miles from London began to build a Fortresse. In the summer following, the Londoners and other neere adioynning, did take to destroy the fortresse of the Danes, but they being put to flight, king Aelfrede pitched a field not farre from the Citie, least the Pagans should take away the Harvest of the Countrey, and viewing the riuer one daie, perceived that the Chanell might bee in one place dammed by, that the Danes should not get out their shippes, he forthwith commanded on both sides of the riuer a damme to be cast, and deuised that riuer into 3. streames, so that where shippes before had sayled, now a small boate could scantily rowe, which when the Pagans perceived, they leauing their wines and ships, flee a soote to Quatbridge, and there building a fortresse, lodged there the Winter following, whose shippes the Londoners bying, some to London, the other they brake downe and destroyed.

Anno 897. the Pagans came from Quatbridge, part into East England, part into Northumberland: some got them shippes and sayled into France. After all these verations, by the cruell Danes committed, followed far greater, the space of thre yeres, by death of cattell, and mortalitie of men: twentie Danish shippes were taken being Pyrates, and the Pyrates slaine or hanged on the gallowes.

The victorious Prince, the studious provider for widowes, orphans and poore people, most perfect in Saxon Poetrie, most liberall, endued with wisdom, fortitude, iustice, and temperance, the most patient bearer of sickness, wherewith he was daily bered, a most discrete searcher of truth in executing judgement, a most vigilant and deuout Prince in the seruice of God, Alfrede, the xix. yere and first moneth of his raigne, departed this life, the xliiii. daie of October, and is buried at Winchester, in the new Monasterie of his foundation. He founded a Monastery of Monkes at Etwilngsey, and an other for Nunnes at Shaftesbury. He ordained the hundreds and tenths, which men call Centuaries and Cupings: hee sent for Grimbald to come into England, that by his aduise he might erect the studie of good learning, cleane decayed. By the counsell of Neotus, hee ordained common scholes of diuers Sciences in Orenford, and turned the Saxon lawes into English, with diuers other Bookes.

He established good lawes, by the which he brought so great a quietnesse to the country, that men might haue hangd golden bracelets and iewels, where the waies parted, and no man durst touch them for feare of the lawe. He caried euery the Psalter in his bosome, that when he had any leasure he might read it ouer with diligence.

He diuided the foure and twenty houres of the day & night into thre parts: he spent 8. houres in writing, reading, and praying: eight in prouision of his bodie: and eight in hearing and dispatching the matters of his subiects. Hee diuided his yereleu reuennues into two parts, and the first he diuided into thre: one part he gaue to his seruants, the second part to his workemen which were occupied in building, the third part to strangers. The second part of the whole he deuided into foure parts, the first part therof he gaue in almes to the poore, the second to Monasteries by him founded, the third to Scholes which hee had erected, and gathered of manie both noble mens and other mens sons of his nation, the fourth part he distributed to the next monasteries in al the English Saxon. Alfwido wiife to king Alfrede founded the Monasterie of Nunnes in Winchester.

Edward surnamed Senzor, the son of Aelfred, was crowned and annointed king at Kingstone, and shortly after Adhelwoldus, cousin germane unto king Edward, revolted and went to the army of the Pagans, who forthwith chose him to be their king in Northumberland.

Ioannes Leoaser in his thirde Booke of the description of Africa, writeth, that about this time (to say) about the yere of our Lord 905. the Englishmen at the perswasion of the Gothes, besieged the great Citie Argilla in Barbary, which the Affricans call Arella, being 70. miles distant from the streight of Marrocho southward, hoping thereby to withdraue the Saracens out of Europe, where they fought with so great courage and good successe, that they swanne the said towne, and so ransacked it with fire and sword, that scant one escaped there, and the Towne laie desolate and without inhabitantes for the space of thirtie yeres. to the 314. yere of Mahomets Hegira, which by conference of their places doeth seeme to beginne in the yere of our Lord 591. which number being added, doe bring forth 905.

Achelwoldus king of the Pagans brought a great army from Casser, and the East English, which robbed and spoiled through all Mercia, and the West countrey, untill they came to Cerikelade, and there went over the Thames, and took great spoiles about Wadney.

King Edward gathered an army and went toward the Danes, but while he tarried for his army out of Kent, Adhelwolfe king of the Danes came upon him with a great power, and bade him battell, wherein Cochrus, and Adhelwolfe kings of the Pagans were slaine.

Hampton.

In the yere 910. a battell was fought at Wodnesfeld, a mile north from Wolfrum Hampton in Staffordshire, where Cowilfus and Healdene kings of the Pagans, with many Carles and nobles were slaine, but of the common people innumerable.

Aethred Carle of the Mercies died, and king Edward took into his Dominion London and Drenford, and all the Countrey adioyning thereunto.

In the yere 913. by the kings commandement, at Hertford, betwixt the riuers of Omeran, Benefician, and Legian, in the north side a Citie is builded.

Hokenorton.

In the yere 914. the Pagans of Northumberland, and Leicestershire, in the countie of Dorsete took spoiles, and in the kings towne called Hokenorton, and in many other places they slewe many people, and returned home againe: another army of the Danes, being horsemen, were sent into Hertfordshire, towardes Legeston, with whom the men of the countrey encountred, and slaying manie of them, put the rest to flight, taking their horses and armour, with a great pray. King Edward leauing certaine to build a citie in the south part of the riuer Ligra, to wit, the towne of Ware, with more part of his army went into Essex, and encamped at Healdune, where hee tarried till a towne was builded at Witham.

In the yere 915. a great naule of Danes sayled about the west countrey, and landed in diuers places, taking great prayes, and went to their shippes againe. The king for strengthening of the Countrey, made a Castell at the mouth of the water of Auon, and another at Buckingham, and the third fast by, that is, on either side of the riuer's course one, & then went into Northampton and Bedfordshires, and subdued the Danes there, with their leader called Turketil.

In the yere of our Lord 918. the Kentish, Southy, and East Saxons, besieged Colchester, and wanne it by force, and slewe all therein, a few excepted that escaped by flight. The same yere king Edward went to Colchester with an armie, repaired the walles, and put a great garrison of souldiers into it.

The next yere died the noble Princesse Elfeda (wife to Etheldredus Duke of of Mercia) and was buried in the Monastery of Saint Peter, which her Lord and she before had builded in the towne of Gloucester, which Monasterie was after thz towne to the ground by the Danes, but Aeldredus Byschoppe of Worke and of Worcester, made there an other, which is now the chiefest Church in the Towne.

This noble woman Elfreda, redified the Citie of Chester, she repaired the Towne of Tamworth, beside Lichfield, Stafford, Warwike, Shrewsburie, Warrisburie, Elloburie, Legeceaster, with a Towne and Castell in the north ende of Mercia, vpon the Riuer of Merce, that is called Runcorne: she builded a Bridge ouer Seuerne called Bimbsberie Bridge, &c.

When she had once assayed the paines that women suffer in traauiling with childe, she euer after refused the embracing of her husband, saying it was not seemely for any noble woman to vse such fleshy liking, wherof should insue so great sorow and paine: she tamed the Welshmen, & in diuers batfels chased the Danes, after whose death, Edward held that prouince in his owne hand.

King Edward builded a newe towne against the old Towne of Nottingham on the south side of the riuer of Trent, and made a bridge ouer the said riuer be-twene the two townes: he subdued the kings of Scotland & Wales: he builded a towne in the north end of Mercia, by the riuer of Merce, and named it Chilwal, and repaired the towne of Manchester: after all which deeds by him done, he deceased at Farinodon, and was buried at Winchester in the newe church, which his father Alfred had builded when he had raigned xliiii. yeres.

A Delstane, after the death of Edward Senior his father, was crowned at Kingstone by Athelmus Archbyshop of Canterbury. His coronation was celebrated in the market place vpon a stage erected on hie, that the king might be seene the better of the multitude. He was a prince of worthy memory, valiant and wise in all his actes, and brought this land into one monarchie: for hee repelled bitterlie the Danes, and quieted the Welshmen. He caused them to paie him yereleie tribute twentie pound of gold, three hundred pound of siluer, and two thousande five hundred head of neate, with houndes and halukes to a certaine number.

And after that he had by batell conquered Scotland, he made one Constans tine king of Scots vnder him, adding this princely word, that it was more honour to him to make a king, then to be a king. He made seuen coining mints at Canterburie, foure for the king, two for the Archbyshop, and one for the Abbot: at Rochester three, two for the king, and one for the bishop: besides these, in London viii. in Winchester vi. in Lewes ii. in Hastings two: in Chichester one: in Hampton two: in Warham two: in Excester two: in Shaftsburie ii.
and in euery good Towne one Coiner.

He founded S. Germanes in Cornewall, which was since a Byschops See:
he founded S. Petrocus at Bodmin: he founded Wilton priory, Glouceston and Spichelney. He walled the citie of Excester with squared stone, of which Citie more shall be shewed in my larger Booke.

Athelstane reigned xv. yeeres, and was buried at Malmesburie.

Edmund the brother of Adelstane took upon him the government of this Realme, whose short raigne took from him the renoune of most high praises that should haue redounded to this posterity: for he was a man disposed of nature to noblenesse and iustice: he took out of the Danes hands the towne of Lincolne, Nottingham, Darbie, Leicester, and Stanford, and brought all Mercia to his dominion: he expelled the two kings, Anlafus the sonne of Sichricus, and Reginald the sonne of Cuthbert, out of Northumberland, and subdued the Countrey to his dominion. He granted the priuiledge vnto S. Edmund, in which the limites of the towne of Edmundsburie are contained.

On Saint Austines day, in the kings towne named Duclechurch, the king (whil实现 he would haue saued his Seluar from the hands of a wicked theefe called Leof) was slaine, when he had reigned v. yeeres, and vii. moneths, and was buried at Glassebury.

Eldred succeeded Edmund his brother: for his sons Edwyne and Edgar were thought too yong to take on them so great a charge. He took on him but as protector, but afterwards he was crowned at Kingstone.

This Eldred had the earnest fauor of the commons, because he was a great maintainer of honestie, and also most abhorred naughty and unruly persons: for his expertnesse in feates of armes, he was much commended, whereby he quieted and kept in due obedience the Northumbers and Scots, and exiled the Danes.

He placed the Bpsh of Cornwall at S. Germans, where it continued till the time of Edward, next before the conquest, in whose time it was translated to Excester.

In the yeere of our Lorde, 951. hee committed to prison Wolfstane, Archbpsh of Dorke in Luthaberie, because hee often had bene accused to haue commanded manie Citizens of Thetford to be slaine, in reuenge of the Abbot Adelme vniuile by them slaine: he was a yeere after released, and restored to his See.

King Eldred builded Spich at Abindone, gaue great landes, and confirmed them Charters with seales of golde.

He reigned nine yeeres, and was buried in the Cathedrall Church at Winchester, in the olde Monasterie.

Edwyn succeeded his vnckle Eldred in the kingdome: hee was crowned at Kingstone, of whome is left no honest memorie, for one heinous act by him committed in the beginning of his raigne.

In the selfe day of his coronation, hee sodainelie withdrew himselfe from his Lords, and in the sight of certaine persons rauished his owne kinswoman, the wife of a noble man of his realme, and afterward slew her husband, that he might haue the vnlawfull vse of her beauntie. For which acte, and for banishing Dunstane, hee became odible to his subiects: and of the Northumbers, and people of middle England, that rose against him, was deprived, when hee had reigned foure yeeres. Hee died and was buried in the new Abbey of Winchester.

Edgar

Edgar the Peaceable, brother to Edwyne, was crowned at Bath. He was so excellent in iustice, and that in correction of vices, as well in his Magistrates, as other subiects, that neuer before his daies was used lesse felonie by robbers, or extortion or byberie, by false officers. He chastised the great negligence, conetousnesse and vicious living of the cleargie, and brought them to a better order. Of stature he was but little, yet of minde valiant and hardie, and verie expert in martiall pollicie. Dunstane was ordained Metropolitane and Primate of England, by whome, and other wise men the king being instructed, did in euerie place oppresse euill persons, reproued rebels under sharpe correction, the iust and modest man he loued and cherished, Churches that had bene destroyed, hee repaired; casting out of monasteries secular Priests, and gathered together companies of Monkes, and of Nunnes, giuing good admonition to the Pastors, whome he appointed to haue rule ouer them. He was in his government discret, ciuill, liberall, gentle, mercifull and valiant; in warres hardie, defending with warlike power the right of his kingdom, bringing his people vnder the obedience of their gouernours, framing his Magistrates to iustice, ordaining rightfull lawes, whereby hee enioyed a quiet kingdom, so that hee needed not to prouoke other to warre, nor anie warre was procured against him, but kept the boundes of his kingdom, so long as he liued, with prudence, fortitude, iustice, and temperance: not onely the Princes of the Isles being tyrants stood in feare of him, but also the kings of manie nations, hearing of his wisdom, and valiancie, did all honour him. Hee caused Widwall king of Wales to paie him, in name of tribute, three hundred Molues yearely (or rather their skinnes) which thing when he had performed for the space of three yeeres, the fourth yeere, was none there to be found.

King Edgare prepared a nauie (as diuers authors haue written) of three thousand and sixe hundred shippes, of the which, after Easter euery yeere, one thousand two hundred, he appointed to come into the East part of the realme; one thousand two hundred into the West parts, and one thousand two hundred into the North parts: This number of shippes being incredible, per aduenture one author following another, the first being deceived by mistaking the same, the rest haue erred, but William Thorne a Monke of S. Augustines by Canterburie, setteth downe the whole number of ships to be 300. and this hath a more likelihood of truth. But to the matter, with the East nauie, he sayd into the West, and sending that backe, hee would saile with the West nauie into the North, and that being sent backe, with the North nauie he would saile into the East partes; and after this sort, hee used to saile round about the whole Island euerie somer, by the which doing, hee prouided for the defence of his kingdom against strangers, and praised himselfe, and his people in exercises of warre.

Marianus.

In the winter season and spring of the yeere, hee trauesled through all the parts of his Realme, diligently searching howe the lawes and statutes were obserued by the Lords, and men of greatest authoritie, least the poore should be oppressed, by the mightie and rich men.

Thus

Thus Edgare notwithstanding his manifold vertues before rehearsed, was reported (saith W. Malmesbury) to be a cruell Prince, and also giuen ouermuch to the lustes of the flesh, and for example they saie, that Edgare hearing tell, that Orgare Earle of Deuonshire had a daughter of passing beauty, named Alfred, he commanded Ethelwold an Earle, and also his secretarie to go looke vpon her, and so to prouide, that if she were according to the common bruted fame, she mought bee his wife. Which Ethelwold toke his iourney, and founde it to be true: whereupon, (being himselfe taken with her loue) learning his message from the king vndone, he laboured to obtaine her to bee his wife: and returning to the king, reported the damosell to be such a one as passed not the common beauty of women, and therefore not mate for so great a State as he: So that after, when the king had set his loue vpon another, Ethelwold obtained the saide damosell in marriage, to his owne destruction, for when the fame of her passing beauty was spread through the whole realme, the king desiring to see her, and by deceit to deceiue the deceiuer, shewing a great countenance to the Earle, appointed a daie to go looke on the woman, which he heard so much commended.

The Earle being in great heauinesse, went before to his wife, and desired her that she should, for the safegarde of his life, disfigure her selfe with some homely apparell, and otherwise as she might: but she breaking promise with her twetched husband, dyessed her selfe in a glasse as curiously as she mought, omitting nothing that mought tempt the king, and prouoke his desire, and according to her meaning it came to passe; for the king no sooner sawe her, but he was taken with her loue, and to obtaine his purpose the sooner, shewing a good countenance to the Earle, hee called him to go with him to hunt in the wood of Marwell, where he shot him through with an arrowe, into the which place, a bastard sonne of the dead Earle came, euen as the deed was done, whom the king asked, how he liked such hunting, who (as men saie) made this answer, I like it well, my Lorde, that liketh you: with which saying he so appeased the kings angrie mind, that the king neuer loued any man better then him, and made amends to the sonne for the cruell act against his father. The king toke Ladie Alfred to wife, and she builded an house of Nuns in the same place where her first husband Ethelwold was slaine.

963. Ethelwald Bpshop of Winchester, in a great famine, solde awaie all the sacred vessels of his Church for to relieue the almost starued people: saying that there was no reason, that the sencelesse temples of God should abound in riches, and liuely temples of the holie ghost lacke it.

Aueredus Rinalensis.

The yere 969. king Edgare, gaue commendement to Dunstane Archbishop of Canterbury, Ethelred Bpshop of Winchester, and Osbold Bpshop of Worcester, that expelling secular Priests out of the great Monasteries, builded through Mercia, they should place Monkes, and to that effect he made the like Oracion as followeth.

Oracion of Edgare.

Because our Lord hath magnified his mercie to worke with vs, it is meet (most reuerend fathers) that with worthe worke, we answer his innumerable benefites: for neither by our owne worde possesse we the earth, and our owne

olwe arme hath not saued vs : but his right hand , and his holie arme ; for that he hath bene pleased with vs : méete therefore it is , that we submit both our selues and our soules to him , that hath put all thinges vnder our fete ; and that we diligently labour that they whome he hath made subiect vnto vs maie be made subiect vnto his lawes . And truely it is my part to rule the lastie , with the lawe of equitie , to doe iust iudgement betwixt man and his neighbours , to punish church robbers , to repressse rebels , to deliuer the weakie from the handes of his stronger : the poore and needie from them that spoile them . And it also belongeth to my care , to haue consideration to the health , quietnesse , or peace of the ministers of the church , the flocke of Monkes , the companies of Virgines , and to prouide the thinges needefull for them . The examining of those manners belongeth vnto you , if they liue chastly , if they behaue themselves honestly towards them which be abroad , if in diuine seruice they bee carefull , if in teaching the people diligent , if in feeding sober , if moderate in apparell , if in iudgement they bee discræte : If ye had cured these thinges by prudent scrutine ( by your licence I speake & reuerend fathers ) such horrible and abhominable thinges of the clearkes had not come to our eares . I omit to speake , that their crowne is not large , nor their rownding conuenient , but wantonnes in apparell , insolencie in behauiour , filthinesse in wordes , doe betray the madnesse of the inward man . Furthermore , howe great negligence is there in the diuines , when in the holy vigils , they will scarce vouchsafe to be present ; when at the holie solemnities of the diuine seruice , they seeme to be gathered together to plaie and to laugh , rather then to sing ?

I will that which good men lament , and euill men laugh at , I will speake with sorrowe ( if so bee it maie be spoken ) how they stowe in banquetings , in drunkennesse , in chambering and wantonnesse , that now clearkes houses maie be thought to bee brotheli houses of harlots , and an assembly of players . There is dice , there is dauncing and singing , there is watching till midnight , with crying and sholoting . Thus the patrimonie of kinges , the almes of Princes , yea , ( and that more is ) the price of that precious blood is ouerthrowne . Hane our fathers , therefore , for this purpose emptyed their treasures : for this intent , hath the kings exchequers by withdrauing of manie reuenewes bene ginen : hath the kings bountifullnes given landes and possessions to Christian Churches for this ende : that Clearkes harlots should be pampered with delicious dainties , that riotous guests maie be prepared for , that houndes , and halokes , and such like toiles maie bee gotten ? Of this the soultours crie out , the common people murmure , the iesters & scoffers sing and daunce , and you regard it not ; you spare it , you dissemble it : Where is the sworde of Leuie , and zeale of Symeon , which killed the circumcised Sichinites being the figure of them that defile the Church of Christ , with polluted ades , abusing Jacobs daughter as a harlot : Where is the spirit of Moyses , that spared not his householde himselfe , worshipping the head of the Calfe : Where is the dagger of Phinies the Priest , who killing him that played the harlot with the Madianite , with this holy emulation pacified Gods wrath : Where is the spirite of Peter, by whose power couetousnesse is destroyed, and Simon shall be, relie condemned: Endeouor to imitate Dei Priestes, in God: It is time to rise against them that haue broken the lawe of God. I haue Constantines, you haue Peters sword in your handes, let vs ioine right handes, let vs couple sword to sword: that the Leapers maie be cast out of the Church, that the hallowed place of our Lord maie be purged, and the sonnes of Leuie may minister in the Church, who saide to his father and mother, I knowe you not, and to his brethren, I am ignorant of you. So to carefully I beseech you, least it repent vs to haue done that that we haue done, and to haue giuen that wee haue giuen, if we shall see that not to bee spent in Gods seruice, but on the riotousnesse of most wicked men, through unpunished libertie. Let the reliques of holie Saintes, which they scoorne, and the reuerende Altars before which they rage, moue you. Let the marvellous deuotion of our auncestors moue you, whose almes the Clarke furie abusethe.

My Great grandfathers father Echelwulfus (as you knowe) gaue the tenth part of all his landes to Churches and Abbeles: my great grandfather Alfrid of holie memorie, thought not meete to spare his treasures, his patrimonie, no coses, no reuenewes that he might enrich the Church: my graund father, the olde Edward, holwe much he gaue vnto the Churches, your fatherhood is not ignorant. It becommeth you to haue in remembrance, with what gifts my father and uncle enriched Christs Altar. Dei Dunstane, father of fathers, beholde, I praye you, the eles of my father shining on thee, from the bright coast of heauen, beare his complaining wordes with a certaine pitte thundering in thine eares. Thou Dei my father Dunstane! Thou gauest me wholesome counsell to build Abbeies and Churches, thou wast my helper and fellow worker in all things. Thee I elected as a shepheard, father and bishop of my soule, and keeper of my manners, when did I not obey thee? what treasure did I preferre before thy counsels? what possessions despised I not, thou commanding me: If thou thoughtest mete to giue anie thing to the poore, I was ready. If thou iudgedst anie thing to be giuen to Churches, I deferred not. If thou complainedst any thing to bee wanting to Monkes or Clarke, I supplied. Thou saidst that almes was euerslasting, and none to bee more fruitfull then that which was giuen to Abbeles and Churches, wherewith Gods seruants maie be sustained, and what remaineth maie be giuen to the poore.

Deceitfull almes, worthy price of the soule! Dei whole some remedie for our sinnes! which from the Priestes Leman sinketh in the little skin of a strange mouse, which adozeth her little eares, which garnisheth her small fingers, which trusteth by her delicate bodie in silke and purple. Beholde Dei father the fruit of mine almes, and the effect of thy promise. What wilt thou answere to this complaint? I know, when thou dost see a theefe, thou runnest not with him, neither hast thou put thy portion with adulterers. Thou hast rebuked, thou hast intreated, and blamed them, wordes are condemned, thou must come to stripes, and thou shalt not want the kings authoritie. Thou hast here with thee Dei venerable father Echelwold Bishop of Winchester, Thou hast the reue-rend Bp̄late of Worcester Oswold: to you I commit this businesse, that both by bishopy censure, and kingly authoritie, with holmes and male, be cast out of the Church, and they that live in order brought in.

King Edgare, hauing restored and new founded fortye seuen Monasteries, which before his tyme had bene destroyed by the Danes and other Pagans, and intending to continue that his intent till the number of fifty were accomplished, he confirmed the Monasterie of Worcester, which Oswold then Bp̄shop of Worcester, by the kings consent, had enlarged, and made it the cathedrall church of that shire.

Ethelwold Bp̄shop of Winchester, renewed the Monasterie of Ely, and Edgare confirmed his foundation, with great priuiledges, as by his Charter may appeare.

Moze concerning the state of the Church of England in those daies maye appeare by the wordes of Edgare in his Charter to the Abbey of Malmesbury, which are to this effect: All the Monasteries in my Realme, to the outward sight, are nothing but worme eaten, and rotten timber and boordes: and that worse is, within they are almost emptye and void of deuine seruice.

The Danes and all other people in England, vsed the vice of great drincking. The king therefore by counsell of Dunstane put downe manie alehouses, and would suffer but one in a village or towne, except it were a greatborough: hee ordained certaine cuppes with pinnes or nalles, and made a law, that whosoever dranke past that marke at one draught, should paye a certaine paine.

Alwinus Alderman Earle of East Angles, kinsman to king Edgar, founded the Abbey of Ramsey: King Edgare confirming the same on Christmas daie, the yere of our Lorde God nine hundred seuentie and foure, in the presence of all the Nobilitie. The same yere was an earthquake through all England.

Edgar being at Chester, entered the Riuer of Dee, hee toke the rule of the helme, and caused eight kings to row him vnto Saint Johns Church, and from thence vnto his pallace, in token that he was Lord and king of so many prouinces. The names of the 8. kings were, Rinoch king of the Scots, Malcolme of Cumberland, Macone king of Man and of many Ilands, Dufnal king of Demetia or South Wales, Siferth and Huwall kings of Wales, Iames king of Galatway, and Iukil of Westmerland. King Edgare reigned xvi. yeres, and was buried at Glaffenbury.

By his first wife Egghede (as some doe write) or by a religious hotarie, as some other doe write, he had issue Edward surnamed the Martyr, who succeeded after his father. His wife Elfrith daughter to Ordgarus, Duke of Deuonshire, he receiued another sonne named Ethelred, and a daughter named Wolfrith.

Edward the sonne of Edgar was crowned at Kingstone, by the handes of Dunstane Archbishop of Canterburie, and Oswald Archbishoppe of York. This man might well bee compared to his father for his modestie and gentleness, so that he was woorthely fauoured of all men, except onely of his stepmother mother, and other of her alliance, which ever bare a grudge against him, for so much as she desired to have the governance of the Realme for her owne sonne Ethelred.

The king murdered.

This Edward while he was hunting in a forest (by chance) lost his company, and rode alone to refresh himselfe at the castle of Corfe in the Isle of Dorset, there, by counsell of his Stepmother Elfrida, he was traiterously murdered as he sat on his horse, when he had reigned iii. yeres. He was buried at Wareham, and after at Shaftesburie. Elfred did after that take great penance, and builded ii. Monasteries of nuns, Almesburie and Warewell: in which Warewell she after liued a solitarie life till she died.

Ethelred commonlie called Unreadie, the sonne of king Edgar, by his second wife Elfred, was crowned at Kingstone. But because he came to the kingdome by wicked meanes, and by killing his brother, hee could neuer get the good will of the people, who had conceived an ill opinion of him: of this arose ciuill wars within the Realme, and often dissention and discords, as well of the Nobles as of the common sort.

In the yere 982. a great part of the City of London was burnt, which City at this time had most building from Ludgate toward Westminster, and little or none where the hart of the city is now, except in diuers places was heuising, that stode without order: so that manerities, as Canterburie, Poike, and other in England, passed London in building: but after the conquest it encreased, and now passeth all other.

The same yere Anlaf king of the Norwales, and Sweyne king of Danes on the date of the nationie of our Lord, in rebell. Galleis came by to London, which they attempted to breake into, and to set on fire: but they were repulled, not without their great detriment and losse by the Citizens. Whereupon they being driuen with force, leauing London, set vpon Easters and Kent, by the Seacoasts burnt towne, and wasted the fieldes, without respect of sexe or age killed all, and wasted with fire and sword all that they might carry awaie. At length being pacified with a tribute of 16000. poundes departed to their ships, and wintered at Southampton.

In the yere 1002. king Ethelred caused all the Danes in England to be shaine upon the daie of Saint Brice. The same yere Villicus Spoie founded a Monasterie at Burton upon Trent. In the yere 1006. The deceitfull Edrike of Straton, hade the noble Duke Alshelmus to a banquet at Shzobsbury, from whence he had him out to hunt, where a certaine Butcher of Shzobsbury named Goodwin Bozthurd, whome Edrike long before had hyed, leapt out of a place, where he had laine in waite for him, and withedgely slewe Alshelmus. And within a while after, his sonnes, Wulfegus, and Wegate, by cominadement of the king Ethelred, at Coham, where the court then lay, had their eies put out.

In the yere 1007. king Ethelred made Edrike of Straton duke of Mercia, and gave to him his daughter Edina to wife. This Edrike the son of Egelricus was but a man of low kinred, to whome neuertheless, his eloquent tongue had purchased riches and nobility: willy he was of wit, pleasant of speech, and passed all men in those daies in enuite, falsehode, pride, and crueltie, he had to his brethren Britricus, Alficus, Beda, Agelricus, Agelwardus, Agelmarus, father to Godwine Duke of West Saxons.

In the yere 1009. Swaine king of Denmarke, with the Danes fought a great battell against Viskettell at Kengemoze.

In the yere 1010. The army of Danes march through the wood called Cliston to Drford, which towne they bzent & destroyed. Then marching about into East Angles, spoiled that country, bzent Thetford, Grantbydige. Then they spoiled the shires of Hertford, Buckingham, and Bedford. Then they wasted Northamptonshire, Wiltsire, &c. The Danes hauing spoiled the East Angles as is afore thewed, Ailwine byshop of Helmhams, brought the bodie of king Edmund from Bedeslwozth through Eastser, ouer Stratfordbydige, and so to London in at Criplegate, (a place so called of cripples begging there) at which gate (it is said) the bodie entring, myracles were wrought, as, some of the lame to go byright praying God. The body of king Edmund rested for the space of thre yeres in the parish church of S. Gregory, adioyning vnto the cathedrall church of S. Paul, from whence it was conueyed backe againe to Stapleford in Eastser, and so to Bedeslwozth, now called Bery in Suffolke, where it thop Ailwyne builded for him a new Church.

In 1011. East Angles, East Saxons, Middlesex, Bedfordshire, Dorsetshire, Grantbridgehire, halfe Huntingdonshire, and Northamptonshire: and on the south side of Thames, Kent, Surrey, Southsex, Southampton, Wiltshire, and Berkshire, being destroyed with sword and fire, king Ethelred required peace with the Danes, promising to them stipendes and tribute: to the which they feiningly assented, but yet they neuer left their cruelties: at length they besieged and destroyed Canterburie, and for that the Archbyschoppe Elfegeus would not yelde to them, he was first imprisoned there, and after conuicted to Greenwich, and there stoned to death. Christs Church is spoiled and burnt: the Monkes with all other men are tentred, i.e. of euery x. being put to death, the tenth suffered to liue in miserie: the number of them that were left aliuie, was 4. monks, & of lay people 800. so that the number slain was 36. monks, & 8000. of the lay people.

In the yere 1012. they toke tribute of 48000. poundes, and at the last, after diuers overthowles giuen to the men of this Islande, they possessed the same, and put king Ethelred to flight, constraining him to liue in exile among the Normans.

This Ethelred had two wiues, Ethelgina an English woman, and Emma a Norman: of the first he had two children, of which, sauing of Edmund, who succeeded him in the kingdome, it were nothing to our purpose to speake: of the second that was Emma sister to Richard Duke of Normandie, there were borne two sonnes, to wit, Edward and Alured. And that I doe here (contrary to that is commonlie vsed) set Edward before Alured as elder brother, I am moued therunto by no small authoritie, which I haue taken out of the Historiographers of that age, out of Gemeuicensis, a most diligent writer of genealogies, and one other Authour, who in his commentarie written in prayse of Emma the Queene, affirmeth, that Edward was the elder brother, whome I do the better beleue, because it is not like, that he seeing the thinges with his eyes, shoulde mistake the matter, especiallie writing to the D. who was mother to them both.

Swanus in the meane time subdued all Englande, and the people for feare yelded vnto him on euerie side, ouer whome most cruellie he triumphed. But not long after he departed this life at Geinburge, and left Canutus his sonne successor in the kingdome.

Ethelred hearing that Swanus was dead, leauing in Normandie with Duke Richard his Sisters Sonne, Emma his Wife, and the Children that hee had by her, returned with all speede into Englande with Edmund his Sonne by his first Wife, being then at Mans state, and by the truifinesse of his owne men, and the ayde of the Normans, moued warre against his enemy.

Canutus finding himselfe unable to match with him, went into Denmarke, minding to returne hither immediatly againe.

Ethelred being, contrary to his expectation thus restored to his kingdome, shewed great cruelty vpon the Danes that remained in England, sparing neither ther man nor woman, young nor olde. Therefore Canutus being herie distressed to reuenge the same, prepared a new army, and came into England against Etheldred with all speed he coule, raging wide and side with fire and sword. Etheldred in the meane season, whether by sicknesse or for sorowe, died, when he had reigned 38. yeres, and was buried in the north Ile of Saint Pauls Church in London.

To. Tactoz:
W. Mamef.
Alfredus Beuerl,

Edmond the son of Etheldred by his first wife, succeeded in the kingdome, who (whether it were for the great strength of his bodie, or for that hee always used to go in armour) was surnamed Ironside.

Canute in the meane time, with all his nauie came vp to London, & on the south side the Thames, he caused a trench to be cast, through the which he caused all his ships to be towed or drawne into the west side of the bridge. And after with a deepe and large trench and siege they compassed the Citie round about, and so shut by all going in or out, of all manner of persons: and after attempted to haue wonne it by assault, but that would not serue, the Citizens made so valiant resistance, that in the end, the enemies were repulled farre from the walls: whereupon the siege for a time being dismissed, part of the army being left to keepe the ships, the other part went into the West Saxonie, with such speed, that they gaue no leisure vnto king Edmund to gather his arme, notwithstanding, with that small army which he had, he boldly met with them in Dorsetshire, and joining battell with them at Penham nere to Gillingham, he ouercame them, and put them to flight.

After this, king Edmund determining manfully to giue battell vnto Canute with a greater hoste then before, mette with his army at a place called Shereffane in Worcestershire, where he in the foreward fiercely fought, executing the office both of a hardie souldiour and valiant Captaine. But because Edrike of Straton, the offe named Traitor, and the beloued Almaricus, and Algarus the sonne of Meaninus, which ought to haue ayded him with the Southamptonshire men and Wiltshire men were of the Danes party, hee was soe wearied, but yet the first day of the battell, the fight was so extreame and bloodie, that both the armies were so wearied, they were not able longer to fight.

The next day the king had ouerthrowne the Danes, but for Edrike of Straton, who seeing the Englishmen haue the better hand, he cutte off the head of a certaine man, named Osmearus, like to king Edmund in face and haire, and holding it vp, cried out, that the Englishmen fought in vaine, and held by the head, saying: Your master king Edmund is dead, slie as fast as you can: which the Englishmen had no sooner heard, but they were readie to slie. But shortly after vnderstanding the king to bee alive, they tooke courage againe, and are carried vpon the Danes, and beate downe a great number of them. After this about midnight Canute commanded his people to depart with silence, and hauing toward London, went to their ships, and shortly after besieged London. Duke Edrike sued for pardon, and obtained it.

King Edmund hastned toward London, and deliuered the Londoners from the siege, chaling the Danes to their ships.

About two daies after, king Edmund passed ouer the Thames at Brentforde, but passing the river manie of his men were drowned. He encreasing his armie, hastied toward the West Saxons. And the Danes againe go vp to London, but coulde there profite nothing: wherefore going from thence with their nauie, they enter the riuer of Aine, and passe into Mercia, there to fetch spoiles, slaying all they met, and burning Townes, and so laden with spoyle returne unto their shippes. After this their souldiers passe in shippes into the riuer of Medway, but their horsemen take prayes vpon the land.

King Edmund againe passed the Riuer of Thames at Brentforde, entered Kent, and fought with the Danes at Otford, and put them to flight: and if the false Edrike had not staied him at Caglethorpe or Nelthorpe, hee had that daie gotten the full victorie. To see shortly, the first and last battell was at Assenden in Essex, nere to Rochford, here he put his army into three battells.

In the meane time Canute bringing his men into order, a foie battell was fought, and manie slaine on both sides. But Edrike perceiuing the Danes to giue ground, he with his power fledde, as he had promised to Canute, and so king Edmund and the English armie had the worst: there was slaine in that battaille, Duke Alfrike, Duke Godwine, Visekerrell Duke of East Angles, Athelwardus Duke, sonne to the Duke of East Angles, Athelwine called Gods friend, a duke: and almost all the companie of the English nobilitie. Cadnoth also bishop of Lincolne, sometimes Abbot of Ramsay, and Wolfey the Abbot, which were come together with their clergie to pray to God for the souldiers that fought, were slaine. And Edmund went almost alone on foote to Gloucester, where he gathered a newe foie to set vpon his enemies, but Canute pursued him as he fled. And hauing prepared their armies, both the kings themselves attempted to fight hand to hand for the right of the kingdome in the Isle of Mania in Seuerne, in the which combate, they both being wearied, fell to a couenant to deuide the same, so that the one halfe of the kingdome should be vnder Canutus, and the other halfe vnder Edmund, which Edmund not long after died at London, slaine by the treason of Edrike of Straton, and was buried at Glasseburie, leauing Edmund and Edward his children very young.

Canutus the Dane, taking an occasion, because in the couenant that was concluded concerning the deuiding of the Realme, no assurance was made for the children of Edmund, he chalenged all England to himselfe alone by lawe as they call it, of growing to, which was a most easie thing for him to doe, because there was no man that durst erect himselfe as patrone to defende the childrens right and title, and by this subtilie and craftie interpretation of the couenant the Dane got the Monarchie of England, and slawe the brother of Edmund, and conuicted the children farre awaie out of England, least they shoulde at anie time be brought againe and receiue their right. Some say, they were sent to a certaine man that was a Prince in Swethland, there to be dispatched out of the wale: and that the Prince vnderstanding they were kings children, childzen, spared them, contrarie to the credite and trust that was committed unto him: which appeareth to bee true, in that the same forraine Lorde kepte and brought vpp the childzen honorable, the yongest of which, whose name was Edward, did afterwarde marrie Agatha, the daughter of Henrie the fourth, Emperour of Rome, of whome he had many childzen, of which we shall speake hereafter. And the other, which was the elder brother, whose name was Edmund, died without childzen.

In the meane season Canutus, because he had no heire that lawfully might succede him in his kingdome (for Harolde and Swaine were begotten of a concubine) partlie that he might establishe in time to come the kingdome that he had gotten vnto his owne kindred that came by lawful succession; and partlie that he might purchase to himselfe the friendship of the Englishmen, and of the Normans, procured to haue giuen him in marriage Emma, the widow of king Etheldred, who at that time was with Edward and Alured her Sonnes in exile with Duke Richard in Normandie, which marriage seemeth to bee made euen by Gods prouidence, who had determined to restore the common wealth in England, whereby, as by the Lawe and Title of Recouerie, and returne out of exile, the monarchie of all England, which the Danes had taken from the Englishmen, and had possessed fere and twentie yeeres and more, did returne agayne to the Englishmen that were the right heires. For Emma concluded marriage with the Dane, vpon condition that the kingdome of England shoulde remaine vnto none other but vnto the childzen that were begotten of her, if anie of them did remaine alieue: by reason of this marriage, shortly after the did beare Canutus a sonne of his owne name, commonly called Hardy Canutus.

By this affinitie and alliance, the Danes became of the more strength and power. He kept the Englishmen in his seruice so long as he liued.

At the feast of Christmasse, king Canute being at London, commaunded the traytour Edrike of Stratton to bee put to death in his Wallace closelis for feare of tumulte. Some saie, hee was tormented to death with firebrands and linkes: some saie one waie, some another, but dispatched hee was: for the king feared, through his treason to be circumuented of his kingdome, as his predecessors had bene before, to wit, Ethelred and Edmund. His bodie hee caused to bee layde forth on the wall of the Citie, there to remaine vnburied, to bee seene of all men. With him also were slaine, Northman a Duke, son to duke Leofwinus brother to Leofricus, and Ethelwardus the son of duke Egelmere, and Brithricus sonne of Elfegus prince of Deuonshire: these died without fault (sayeth mine Authour.) The king made Leofike Duke in his brothers place, and helde him afterwarde verie deare. King Canute subdued the Scots, whereby he was king of Englande, Scotlande, Denmarke, and Norway.

Canute founded anewe the Monastery of Saint Edmund at Bury, restoring to the same, the donation which Edmund king of the West Saxons had given to Saint Edmund the king and Martyr, who was there buried: he displaced the secular Priests for their dissolute life, and placed there an Abbot with Monks, he gave to them many great livelodes, and made a ditch onerthwart Newmarket heath, it is now by some called, the Duielles ditch, to enclose the lands sometime belonging to king Edmund, and discharged the same of all tribute.

King Edward the Confessor, since that time, not onely confirmed the same liberties of S. Edmund, but also gave to Abbot Baldwin a Stampe, and authority to haue an exchange or mintage, and to coine in his Monasterie: And more to encrease their franchise, gave the manour of Mildenhall and holtone, with eight hundreds to their possession (saith John Lydgate) and true it is, that I find in recozd, the franchise of Saint Edmundsbury, to containe these hundreds following, Blackbozne, Kilsbridge, Thedwardster, Babbar, Colford, Ethingo, Lackeford, and Erning halfe hundred. Thus much for the liberties of that Colone. Now Baldwin a Monk, of Saint Dionys, physician to the said king Edward, being made Abbot of Bury in the space of nine and twenty yeres, erected a newe Church of stone, by licence of William Conquerour, brought from Cane in Normandy, landed at Ratlisden, and from thence brought by land to Bury: the foundation was accomplished, and the bodie of the Martyr, was translated out of a chappell called Rotund, into a chyrine prepared for him in the new Church of Bedyswozth or Bury, in the yere of our Lord God 1095. Thus much for Bury.

The church which king Canute, and Earle Turketell builded on the hill of Assen in Essex, was dedicated with great honour, of Wolstane Archbishop of Dorke and other bishops, the king and nobles being present.

Hee appointed to be king of Norway Swanus his sonne (as was saide) by Alfgine daughter to Arhelme Duke of Northampton, and Lady Vulfrune: but other saide hee was a Priestes sonne. He also appointed his sonne Hardicanutus by Emma to bee king of Denmarke, and deceased at Shaftesburie, when hee had reigned twentie yeres, and was buried in Saint Swichins at Winchester. After whose decease and buriall, Queene Emma made her abode there.

Henry of Huntington of this Canute hath as followeth: Men (saith hee) doe speake of the great deedes that hee did: first, that he married his daughter to the Emperour Conradus: that he went nobly to Rome, and came againe with pretious giftes: that he set his fete on the sea strand while the sea was flowing, and commanded the Sea not to rise, to wet his Lordes fete or clothes: but the Sea keeping his olde course, rose, and wet both his fete and his thighes: whereupon the king started away, and saide: All men shall wete and knowe, that the power and might of kings is vaine, and vanitie: and that none

none is worthy to haue the name of king, but hee that hath all thinges subiect to his commandement and lawes. And after this, this Canutus neuer bare Crowne vpon his head, but hee set the same vpon the head of the Crucifix at Winchester. Peter Picauti, once chancelloz of Paris, saith, that the custome to hang by the armour of kings and noblemen, and other in churches, sprang of that this Canutus refused to weare his crowne, and offered the same as is shewed.

Harold, for his swiftnesse called Harefoote, whome Canutus had by a Concubine Alice of Hampton, a Shoemakers daughter (affirming himselfe to be sonne of Canutus, and Alfgina the Earle of Northhamptons daughter) slept not vpon the occasion and opportunitie offered, but vsing the force of the Danes that dwelt in England, inuaded the realme, while his brother Hardicanute governed in Denmarke.

He toke from his mother in law Emma, the most part of the riches and treasure that Canute his father had left her, and then with consent of the great lords beganne to raigne, but not so mightily as his father Canutus did, for a more lust heire Hardicanutus was looked for, whereupon the kingdome was deuided, the North part to Harold, and the South to Hardicanute.

Edward and Alfred Sons to king Ethelred, with manie knights, came out of Normandy, to see their Mother at Winchester, which sore troubled the mindes of many great men, who bare more fauour to king Harold. Especially Godwyne Earle of Kent, faining to receiue Alfred as a friend, came to meete him, but in the end put him in prison, part of his company he put in fetters, and after put out their eyes. Of some hee caused their skinne to be plucked ouer their eares, chopping off their hands and fete. Some he commaunded to be sold, and diuers were murdered at Gilsford.

After this, Alfride was conueied to the Ile of Ely, where his eyes being first plucked out, hee was deliuered to the Monkes to be kept prisoner there, where shortly after hee departed this life, and was buried in the south Ile of the west part of the Church. Because Hardicanutus delaied to come ouer being sent for, hee was vtterlie reiected, and Harold, who before was king of the Mercies and Northumbers, was chosen king of all England, who shortly after expelled his mother in law Emma out of the Realme. Hee reigned three yeres, died at Oxford, and was buried at Westminster, and after at S. Clements without Templebar at London.

Hardycanutus the lawfull begotten Sonne of Canutus and Emma, as some as hee had gotten his fathers kingdome, fetched home his mother out of exile: and in reuenge of displeasure that was done to her, and of the murder of his brother Alured, hee commanded the carcasle of Harold to be digged out of the earth, and to be throwne into the Riuer of Thames, where by a fisher it was taken vp, and brought to the Danes, who buried it in a church yard, which they had at London.

Whith done, the king appointed eight markes to be paid to euerie sailer in his his name, and twelue markes to euery pilote or maffer, which tribute was to be paid of all England, so grieuous, that scarce any was able to beare it.

Shortly after, he sent for Edward the sonne of Etheldred his brother on the mothers side, to come into England, and embraced him with a loue and fauor. Being at a marriage feast pleasantly drinking with the Wife and other persons, in the midst of his cups he fell sodainly downe to the ground, and so remaining dumbe, departed this life the thirde yeere of his raigne, and was buried by his father at Winchester.

Edward borne at Ilip besides Oxford, the son of Etheldred, whome Hardicanutus had sent for into England at the age of almost fourty yeeres, was by the helpe of Godwine crowned at Winchester.

Dane gilt.

This Edward for his excellent holinesse, is vntill this day called Saint Edward, who so soone as he had gotten his fathers kingdome, of his owne free will released the tribute of fourtie thousand poundes called Dane gilt, which the English people, euen from the vertie beginning of the raigne of the Danes, was compelled to paye to thre kings euery yeere. He was also the chiefe author and cause, that the law which we call the common Law, was first brought vp, being gathered together out of the lawes and ordinances of foure nations, which were receiued when the Island was subiect to diuers regiments and gouernances, to witte, of the Mercies, of the West Saxons, of the Danes, and of the Northumbers. He was hard to his mother, because she was hard to him in his minority, and also suspected with Alwine bishop of Winchester, whom he put in prison by counsell of Robert Archbishop of Canterburie: but after his mother had purged her selfe, Alwine was deliuered, and Robert the archbishop conueied himselfe out of England. He toke to wife Edgitha, the daughter of Earle Godwine, who was a Virgin most chaste, in whose breast there was a Schoole of all liberall Sciences (saith William of Malmesbury.) And for a further testimony of the said Quene, Ingulphus writeth thus: Vnto this Edward was giuen to wife, the daughter of Earle Godwine, a very beautiful Damosell, vertie well instructed in learning: and for behaviour, and the rest of her life, a virgin most chaste, & for humility most holy, named Edgitha, in no point fauouring of her father or brothers barbarousnes, but milde and modest, faithfull and honest, enemy, or hurtfull to no bodie: whereupon this verse was spoken of her:

I haue seene her (saith Ingulphus) often, when being yet but a boie, I came to see my father, dwelling in the Kings Court. And often, comming from Schoole, when I mette her, she would appose mee touching my learning and lesson, and falling from Grammar to Logicke, wherein she had some knowledge, would subtilly conclude an argument with me, and by a hand maid giue thee or foure pennes of money, and send me vnto the place where I should receiue some viduals, and so be dismissed.

Now concerning this Edward, he was borne in England, as is afore shewed, but brought vp in Normandie, and continuing there a long time, was in a manner become French, bringing hither, and drawing out of Normandy herie manie, whom he promoted to diuers dignities, and exalted aboue measure. Among whome chiefly was one Robert a Monk of Gemtesence, made by him first Bishop of London, and after Archbishop of Canterbury. And William the kings Chaplaine made bishop of Dorchester.

Then beganne the whole land vnder the king, and other Normans brought in, to leaue off the English rites, and in manie things to imitate the maners of the French. All the noble men tooke it to be a great point of gentrie in their courtes to speake the French tongue, to make their Charters and dedes after the manner of the French, and to bee ashamed of their olde custome and vse, as well in this, as in many other things. But here of more in another place.

He sent for home into England his nephew Edward the sonne of king Edmund his brother, who by reason of his long absence out of the countrey, was commonly called the Outlawe. This is that Edward the sonne of king Edmund surnamed Ironside, which remained aliue, whome Canutus when hee had gotten England, had sent into Sweden with his brother. He knowing the aduise of his vnckle, came againe into England, and brought with him Agatha his wife, and Edgar, Margaret, and Christian his children, bozne in Paris nonla, in hope of the kingdome, where hee liued but a while. Thus Saint Edward being disappoynted, both of his nephew and his heire, for that Edward the Outlaw was both by nerenesse of blood, and by lawfull succession right heire vnto the kingdome, without delaie pronounced Edgar the Outlawes sonne, and his great nephew, to be heire of the kingdome, and gaue him to surname Adeling, which name in those daies was peculiar onely to kings children, which were bozne in hope and possibilitie of the kingdome: for this word Adeling, in the English tongue is as much to say, as Prince or Lord, the contrarte of which word is Vnderling, that is to say, a seruant or bondman: or, according to the Welch speech, Adeling signifieth heire: but because this Edgar was but young of yeeres, and within age, by his testament he made Harolde the sonne of Godwine (a stout man both in warre and peace) Regent, untill the young Edgar should bee of age to receiue the kingdome, and that then hee should be made the king: which thing Harolde with a solemne othe promised to see so performed and done. Notwithstanding, he like a Traytour (by force of armes) immediately after the death of Edward, refused the name of Regent, and pronounced himselfe king, which thing shortly after brought destruction both to himselfe, and to all England.

In the yere 1047. Swaine king of Denmarke sent Embassadors to king Edward, requiring of him a naue against Magnus king of Norway, but none were sent.

In the yere of our Lorde 1048. Magnus being dead, Swaine recovered Denmarke, and Harold Haruager sonne to king Swadus of Norway, returned into Norway, and shortly after sent Embassadors vnto king Edward, offering to him peace and amitie, which hee accepted, and promised the like againe.

A great earthquake chanced on the first of March: a mortalitie of men and beasts followed, and lightning bent vp towines, and corne in the fields, where through rose such a dearth, that one horse load of wheate was solde for five shillings.

In the yere 1049. the Irish pirates with 36. ships entring into the mouth of Senerne, arrived in a place called Wiltstapham, and with the help of Grif. fish king of Southwales, spoiled about those coastes, and did much mischief. After this the saide Grif. fish, and those Irish pyzates toyning their powers together passe ouer the river Wite, and bent Dumenham, and slew all that they there found. Against whome Aldredus byshop of Worcester, and other of Worcester and Herefordshires hastily went, but the Welshmen whome they had in their company, sent messengers to Grif. fish, willing him to make speed against the Englishmen, which hee did, and slew many of them, and put the rest to flight.

In the yere 1050. Edfine Archbishop of Canterbury deceased, in whose tome the king placed Robert a Normane, late bishop of London, a great enemy to Duke Godwine, as shall be shewed in my larger Chronicle.

This yere king Edward and Edgitha his wife translated the bishops Sea from S. Germanes at Crispington, and placed the same at Excester: the king laying his right hand vpon the Altar of S. It is reported that the kings clemencie was moued to compassion, vpon occasion as followeth. at the first beholding thereof much afraid, protesting, that he did see a Diuell dancing vpon the hespe of money, and making ouermuch ioy. And thereupon gaue comāndement, it should be forthwith rendered againe to the former owners thereof, & of so cruell an exaction, he would not keepe one farthing, but released the said tribute for euer. Eustace Earle of Bulloigne the elder, which had to wife Goda the sister of king Edward, arrived at Dover in Kent with a fewe ships, in the which Godwine whilst his souldiers rashly toke vp their Armes, they slew one of the towne-men, in reuenge whereof, not onely the quarreller, but other of his company, with many of the Towne were slaine, which doing so much offended Godwine Earle of Kent, that hee assembled a great power out of all his Countreies, of Kent, Sussex, and Wessex, and his eldest sonne Harold out of his Earldomes of Hereford, Gloucester, Hereford, Somerset, and Barkshires, & his son Swaine out of Essex, East England, Huntingdon and Cambridg shires, so that he had a great armie, wherewith he marched towards Gloucester, where the king then lay, vnto whom he sent messengers to denounce warre, except he would deliuer Eustace, and his fellow Normans and Boloni-ans, which held a Castell vpon the Cliffe of Dover: but king Edward when he vnderstoode that the armies of Leofrike Earle of Chester, Siward Duke of Northumberland, and Ranulph Earle of Hereford were comming to his aide, he answered stoutely, that hee would in no wise deliuer Eustace or the other demanded. But after this, Godwines armie entring into Gloucester, it was there agreed, that at a date appointed, the king and Earle Godwine should meete at London: & thus departing for the time, the king increasing his army, led the same to London, and Godwine with his power came to Southwarke on the other side of the riuer Thames into his own house, but there because his army by little & little slipped from him, he fled, and the king forthwith pronounced him, with his five sonnes, to be banished, who straightwaies with his wife, and two of his sonnes came to Thorney, where his Shippe being laden with gold, siluer, and precious things, he sailed toward Flanders: his other sonnes toke ship at Wyssow, and sayled into Ireland.

The king forsaketh his wife Quēne Edgitha for displeasure conceiued against her father duke Godwine, and sent her with one maiden vnto Wilton, in no honourable wise, where she was committed to the custody of the Abbesse, William of Malmesbury addeth, that her goods being taken from her to the uttermost farthing, she was sent to Wilton thre to bee kept vnder the kings sister, least whilst all her parents were in sorrow for their Countrey, she alone should rest in ease: but a namelesse author, that wrote a booke intituled Vita Edwardi, which he dedicated to the same Edgitha writeth thus. The king pretending this honest cause of diuorce, that in the Monasterie of Wilton, where she had bin brought vp, she should be, to quiet such troubles of the realme. Thus therefore with kingly honor, and princely company (yet sorrowfull) shee was brought to the bondes of the Monasterie of Wilton, where almost one whole yere in prayers and teares she expected the day of comfort.

Emma late wife to the kings, Etheldred and Canutus, and mother to two kings, Hardicanutus and Edward, departed this life at Winchester, on the first of March, and was there buried.

Griffith king of Wales wasted a great part of Herefordshire, against whom, the men of that country & Normans out of the castel, went; but Griffith obtained the victory, slaying many of them, and toke a great pray.

In the next yere, Harold and Leofwine, sonnes of Earle Godwine, returning out of Ireland, entred Seuerne, arriued with many Ships in Somerset and Dorsetshires, spoiled manie Townes in the Country, slew many people, and returned with pray, then they saile about Portsmouth, &c.

Earle Godwine landed in Kent, gathered a power, sayled to the Isle of Wight, waisting along the Sea coastes, till his sonnes Harold and Leofwine came with a flauie, which being come together, they take their course vppon the Riuer of Thamis, came to Southwarke, and there staid for the tide, and then weighed by Anchor, and finding none that offered to resist them on the byldge, they sailed by the south side of the riuer, & his armie by land, placing it selfe vpon the banks side, made shew of a thicke and terrible battaile.

After this, the flauie turned toward the North shore, as though it woulde haue compassed in the kings flauie: but they that were with the king, and with Godwine, abhorred to fight against their owne kindred and countrymen, wherefore a peace was made, Godwine with his sons were restored to all their former honoz, and the Normans were banished the land. Such as had given the King evil counsel against the English, a few excepted, as Robert the deacon & his son in law, Richard fits Scroby, Alfride the kinges sewer, Anfridus surnamed Geereffet, and other whom the king before the residue loued, & had been faithfull to him and his people, these were permitted to remain in England. Rob. Archbishop of Canterbury, Wil. but when his strength failed him, on Thursday following he died in miserable torment, and was buried in the olde Monasterie of Winchester, whose Dukedome his sonne Harold toke vpon him, and his Carledome is giuen to Algarus the sonne of Leofricus Earle of Chester, thus hath Flurens of Winchester. Now to adde somewhat out of Vita Edwardi, Duke Godwine (saith he) and his sonnes being reconciled to the king, and the Countrey being quiet, in the second yere after, died the said Duke of happye memorie, whose death was the sorrow of the people, him their father, him the nourisher of them and the kingdome, with continuall weeping they bewailed: he was buried with wondrous honoꝝ in the old Monasterie of Winchester, giuing to the same Church giftes, ornaments and rentes of lands. Harold succeeded in his dukedome, which was a great comfort to the whole English nation, for in vertue both of bodie and minde he excelled all people, as an other Iudas Macchabeus, and was a friende to his Countrey, diligently supplying his fathers place, and walking in his steppes, that is to saie, in patience, mercie, and affabilitie to well willers, but to disquiet persons, theues and robbers, with a Lyons countenance he threatened his lust feueritie, thus much out of the auncient monument intituled Vita Edwardi.

Touching his issue (saith William Malmesbury) Godwine in his first age had to wife the sister of Knute king of England, Denmarke, and Norway, of whome hee begate a sonne, which when he was past his childe age, whilst hee proudly did ride vpon an horse, which the king his grandfather had giuen him, the horse bare him into the River of Thamis, where he was drowned, his mother also was slaine with a thunderbolt. After her he married another, by whome he had sixe sonnes, to wit, Harold, Swaine, Tostine, Woolnod, Girthe, and Leofwine, &c.

Siward Duke of Northumberland, ouercame Machute king of Scots, and made Malcolme the king of Cumberlands sonne king of Scots.

Siward Duke of Northumberland departed this life at Dorke, and was buried in the Monasterie of Golmanho, dedicated to S. Olave the Martyr, which he had builded.

Griffith king of South Wales, and Algare spoiled the Monasterie of Hereford, slew the Canons and bent the whole Citie. Duke Harold repaired, but Remelinus the Bishop redified it of his owne proper expences.

Cito Edgare son to king Edmund Ironside, by procurement of his uncle king Edward came into England, out of Hungarie, where he had long remained, being now sent by the Emperour honorably accompanied together with his wife Agatha, and their issue to wit, Edgar Adeling, Margaret and Christian, king Edward was purposed to haue made this Edward his heire of his kingdom, but he died, of Edgar Adeling his son ye shall heare more in the raigne of W. Without the walles of London, vpon the riuer of Thamis, there was a little monasterie with a few Monks vnder an Abbot, here the king intended to make his Sepulchre, he commanded therefore, of the tenths of all his rentes the worke to bee begun euen from the foundation, which happilie proceeded till the same was finished, he also caused the Parish Church of Saint Margaret to bee newe builded without the saide Abbey Church, for before the saide Parish Church stode within the olde Abbey, in the south Ile: This Church of Saint Margaret that king Edward builded, continued till the daies of king Edward the first, at what time the staple of wools was at Westminster, and then the parishioners and staplers builded a new the said Church of S. Margaret, the great chancel excepted, which was now lately made before by the Abbot of Westminster. The D. also hauing beene brought vp in the auncient Monasterie of Runnes at Wilton, which Church was but of wood, began there a princelie worke of stone, and seruentlie persisted till the same was in princelie sort finished, dedicated, and indowd it with large possessions in Anno 1065.

This king Edward of famous memory (saith mine Author) before the date of his natiuitie was elected of God, who perseuering in chastitie, led all his life dedicated vnto God in true marriage, wherefore as we haue knotone proued by god and sufficient men being witnesses, God greatlie glorified him in his life with wonderfull signes, amongst the which, this that followeth was one. A yong woman married, but without children, had a disease about her iawes, and vnder her cheek, like vnto kernels, which they termed akoznes, and this disease so corrupted her face with stench, that shee coulde scarce without great shame speake to anie man, this woman was admonished in her slepe, to go to king Edward, and get him to wash her face with water, and she should be whole. To the Court she came, and the king hearing of this matter, disdained not to do it, and hauing a basin of water brought vnto him, he dipped his hand therein, and washed the womans face, and touched the diseased place, and this he did oftentimes, sometimes also signing it with the signe of the Crosse, which after he had thus washed it, the hard crust of skinn was softened and dissolued, and drawing his hand by diuers of the holes, out of the kernels came little wormes, whereof they were full, with corrupt matter and blood, the king still pressed it with his handes to bring forth the corruption, and disdained not to suffer the stench of the disease, vntill he had brought forth all the corruption with pressing, this done, he commanded her a sufficient allowance euery day for all things necessary, vntill she had receiued perfect health, which was within a weeke after, and whereas she was euer before barren, withyn one yere she had a childe by her husband. And although this thing seeme strange, yet the forsmans said that he often did the like in his youth, when he was in forsmandoy.

Next after this, mine authoys affirme, that a certaine man named Vlsunius Spilcorne, the sonne of Vlmore of Nutgarshall, who when he becomed timber in the wood of Wimbrellena, laying him downe to sleepe after his sore labour, the blood and humours of his head so congeled about his eyes, that hee was thereof blind, for the space of 19. yeres, but then (as he had bene mowed in his sleepe) hee went wolwarde, and bare footed to manie Churches, in euerie of them to pray to God for helpe in his blindness, and then last of all hee came to the Court, where a long time hee stood at the entrie of the kings Chamber, an earnest suiter, till at the length the king bearing of the blindmans dreame, hee said, by our Lady Saint Mary, I would doe much with a good will, if it would please God through me to haue mercie vpon the poore wretch, and thus being giuen to it by his seruants, he laid his handes & the water vpon the blind mans eyes, and straightway the blood dropped plentifully from him, and being healed, he cried with a cherefull voice, I see thee, O king, I see thee, O king. Thus having recovered his sight, he kept the kings Pallace at Windsor a long season (for there hee was healed) after king Edward was dead, and decessed in the reigne of William Conquerour.

King Edward sickening on Christmas Eve, decessed on the fourth of Januarie, and was buried at Westminster, on the day of Epiphantie, when he had reigned 23. yeres, 6. monethes, and odde daies.

Alluridus Riualensis writting the life and death of this king, reporteth him to be a man bold of pryde, a lover of peace, a vanquisher of Ire, a contemner of couetousnes, &c. And for example he writteth, that as king Edward on a time lay waking in his bedde, it chanced that his Chamberlain or Steward, taking monie out of one of the kings coffers, lest the same coffer open after him, and went his wates about the kings businesse, which thing being espied of a yong fellow that was wont to wait on the kings table to beare away empty vessell, he came to the coffer, thinking the king had bene a sleape, and thus a great quantitie of monie into his bolome, and going awaie laid it where he thought best, and comming againe did the like, but when he came the thirde time, and that the king knew (as was thought) that his Chamberlaine was at hand, and willing the theefe to be boyde of danger, Thou art importunate saide the king, if thou wilt beleue me, take that thou hast, & get thee hence, for by Gods mother, if Hugelin come (for so was his Chamberlains name) he will not leaue thee one pennie, whereupon the yong fellow ran his way, and was neither bitered nor pursued by the king, and behold, when the Chamberlaine came, and perceived much monie to be gone through his negligence, he was in such sorow, that his sighes and other noyse that he made betwixt him, whereupon the king rising, and seeming not to knowe the matter, asked what hee asled to bee so troubled, which when the Chamberlaine had tolde what had happened, hoide thy peace said the king, happily he that hath taken it hath more neede then we haue of it, let him haue it, that which remaineth is enough for vs.

Girthe brother to Harold.

Harold, the eldest sonne of Godwine, Earle of Kent, hauing obtained faith of the nobilitie toke the Crowne, and that hee might in some behalfe seeme to make the young Edgar amends for the wrong he had done him, gaue him the Carle dome of Orford, and so from a king, he made him an Earle. But in the meane season England began to bee tossed & turmoiled with wars within and without: for the disheriting of the right heire is alwaies wont to be the beginning of ciuill wars.

The 24. day of Aprill, a Comet appeared, not onelie to the people of this land, but also in other parts of the world seauen daies. Toftus enuying (as men saide) the prosperitie of his brother, stirred by troubles in the Realme, for hee joining himselfe to Harold the king of Norway, assaulted England in twarlike sort, both by Sea and Land. Whose attempt whiles Harolde of England prepared to withstand, William Duke of Normandie, who notwithstanding hee was a bastard, was of kinne to Saint Edward in the third and fourth degree of consanguinitie, seeing a conuenient time and occasion offered to take the kings dome in, gathered a nauy of 896. ships, and came into Engl and with a beie well appointed armie, alledging, that by all right and title it was due to him, by the gift of king Edward his kinsman, and also by the couenant that was made, and by oth established betwixt Harold and him. Hee landed at Demesey, nere vnto Hastings in Suffe, on the 28. daie of September, where in going out of the ship, the dukes foote slipped, but he recovered it well enough, and one of the souldiers that were next him, cried vnto him, & said, Oh Duke thou hast gotten Engl and, and thou shalt be king: he fortified there a peece of ground, and intrenched it, leauing there a competent number of his men to keepe the same, went then to Hastings, where he built another fortresse, notwithstanding hee restrained all his host from rousing, and by the space of fiftene daies, hee kept himselfe so quietly, that a man would haue thought he had meant nothing lesse then to haue warre.

Harold, notwithstanding he was bare of men by reason of the battel that he had fought against Toftus and the menne of Norway, yet hearing of Williams comming cuen so bloody as he was in his armour he went towards Hastings, being garded with a very small company of souldiers, his fatal destinies so directing him forward headlong. Notwithstanding hee sent out before, them that should spy and view the number and force of the enemies, which when they were percelued to be among the Dukes tents, Duke William caused them to be led about the tents, and then made them good there, commanding them to be sent home to their Lord safe without harme. When they were returned agayne, Harold asked them what tidings they brought, and they with long commendation extolled the clemencie of the Duke, and in good sadnesse declared that all the host almost did seme to be priests, because they had all the ir face & both their lippes shauen. For the Englishmen did leaue their wypper lips vnshauen, with the haire growing alwaies, which thing also Julius Caesar in his commentaries declareth to be an heathen fashion of the old Bytains.

The king laughing at their follie, saide, they be no Priestes but men of warre, valiant in armes and stout in courage, Girthe his brother tooke the woꝛde out of his mouth, and saide, soasmuch as the Normans be of such great force, me thinketh it were not wisely done of you to ioine battel with them, you cannot denie but that with oꝛ against your will, you made vnto him an othe, wherefoꝛe you shoulde do moze wiselye, if you keepe you out of this present necessity and strait, and do but onely leoparde vs, and let vs abide the daunger to make a shew of battaile, wee which neuer sware to him maie suffice draw our weapons in defence of our Country, you may lustily assist, and rescue vs if we sle, and you maie auenge our death, if wee be slaine. But such was the hardnesse of Harolde, that he woulde giue no good eare vnto his counsaile, because he thought it shame and reproch to turne his backe vnto any danger whatsoever, and with the same indiscreetenes, he draue away a monke that was duke Williams Ambassadoꝛ, onely he wished that God would be iudge betwixt duke William and him.

The Monke brought 3. offers, to wit, that either Harolde shoulde vpon certain conditions giue ouer the kingdome, oꝛ to be king vnder duke Wil. oꝛ else y in the sight of both the armies, they two shoulde try the matter with the sword betwixt them, fo: Duke William chalenged the kingdome (as hee sayde) because king Edward by the counsaile of Sigand Archbshoppe of Canterbarie, of Earle Godwine, and Earle Swardus, had giuen it vnto him, (a thing vnlke to bee true) if Harolde would denie this, hee offered to stande to the iudgement of the sea Apollolike.

Of which meslage, the Ambassadour had none other answer giuen then I told you, whereupon he departed, and encouraged the hartes of his countrymen to bat taile.

Then the foute Captaines on both sides set in order their battalles, according to the fashon of their Countries. The Englishmen (as was reported) when they had spent the whole night in drincking, singing and dauncing, not sleeping one winke, in the morning, without delay fell vpon their enemies, all the footemen with their poleaxes being intrenched with their targets before them, made a ranke that nothing coulde enter vpon them, which thing without doubt shoulde haue bene fo: their safegarde, if the Normans had not fained as though they would haue fled, and by that meanes caused them to break the arraie wherein they had set themselves. The king himselfe stode a fote by the St andard, and his brethren Girthe and Leofwine with him, to the ende that in such a common perill and leopardy, no man shoulde once thinke to fle oꝛ run away. Duke William after he had got the victoꝛy, sent this standert to the Pope, which was made after the shape & fashon of a man fighting, wrought by sumptuous art with gold & pretious stones: on y other side the Normans gaue themselves to acknowledging their sins, and to praier al the night, & in the morning they communicated the lords body. The footmen with their bowes & arrowes defended the first front, & the horsemen were set in the rearward deuided into two wings. D. William then with a loud voyce, declaring vnto them that God would be with them, because his quarrell was iust and good, called fo: his armour immediatly, and through the tumult and hasty running of his seruants, he put his coat of fence on the wꝛong way, to wit, the inner side outward, at which chance he laughed, and turning the right side outwards, said the pwoles of my dukedome shall bee turned into a kingdome. When they beganne to sing the songs of Rowland, to the intent that the example of that man of armes should inflame them that should fight, then after they had called to God for aide, they beganne the battell, fought fiercelie, neither of both parts giuing place till the daie was farre spent, which thing when duke William did perceyue, he gaue his men counsaile to make as though they would flye, & to withdrawe themselves out of the fieelde, by which deuice the ranke of the Englishmen was broken, and whyles they meant to smite their enimies on the backes, the Normans turned themselves in good order, and set vpon the Englishmen, being disperfed and out of array, and so put them to flight. Thus the Englishmen died a faire death in defence of their country, and yet they were not slacke in reuenging of themselves, for they stood hard to it, and made great slaughter of them that pursued them, for having gotten a hill, they overthrew the Normans into the valley, as they courageously did cline to attaine the said hill, and with their dartes which they shot, and stones which they cast vpon the Normans, that were vnder them, with small labour beat them al into the bottome. Also the Englishmen with a speedy, and to them well knowne passage, running through a certaine ditch, did overthrow so many of their enimies following them, that with the dead bodices, they made they balley even with the higher ground, thus it continued all that whole daie, that one while the English, another while the enimies had the better, so long as Harold was aliu, but in the closing of the evening, when he by the shot of an arrowe (which pierced his haine) was killed, the Englishmen fled awaie in the night season: one of the souldiours when Harold was slaine, did cut him in the legge with a sword, for the which deede duke William blaming him for his cowardline and shamefull act, put him out of the wars. Also duke William while he shewed his fiercenes in euerie place, three of his best hozes were slaine vnder him that day, the power of God so defending him that the enimie did drawe no blood of his bodie, notwithstanding the number of dartes throwne at him. The two brethren of king Harold, to wit, Gerthe & Leofwine were there slaine, with almost all the Nobles of England, and the Normans had the victorie, especially (saith Rowle) by meanes of their wooden bowes and arrowes (which the Englishmen had not then in vse) for Duke William commanded his men that some of them should shote disrealie forwarde, and other some vppward, by reason whereof, the arrowes shot vppward, destroyed the Englishmen as they scouped, and the arrowes shot disrealie afore, and wounded them that stood vpright. And king Harold himselfe (ballantly fighting) as afore is said, was shot through the haines, whereof he died, when he had reigned nine monethes and odde daies. This battell was fought nine miles from Hastings in Southeser vpon the 14. day of October being Saturday, in the yere of Christ 1066. There was slaine of Englishmen 67974. saith I. le Tailour in his history of Normandy, or 47944. after other. And of the Normans 6013. besides such as were drowned.

This was (saith Mathew Paris) the dolefull destruction of this swete and pleasant lande, the kinges whereof (meaning the Saxons) at their first coming, ming, with barbarous countenance and gesture, in warlike sort, provoked all men to malice and hatred towardes them, who overcame all men by warre and subtiltie: but after they had receyved the Christian faith, and by little and little applyed their diligence vnto Religion, they neglected the exercise of armour, for the kings did change their habite, and some at Rome, and some in their owne Countrey, sought to change their tempoꝛall kingdomes for euerlasting kingdomes: and many which at their life time embraced worldly things, did yet distribute their treasures vnto all the works of mercy: but afterwards when charitie wayed colde, all their studie and trauaile in religion slacked, and then came the destruction of the inhabitantes: first at the comming of the Danes, and now in the expulsiō of the Englishmen by the Normans: for the noble men giuing themselves to gluttonie and lecherie, did not goe to the Church in the morning, as Christian men vse to doe, but lying in their Chamber dallying with women, did heare the Masse hastily rattel by diuine service. The Clerkes also that had taken orders, if one had learned but his Grammar, euerie one wondꝛed at him, the Monkes made a mocke of their rule, and were both finelie apparelled, & metelie well fed. The common people were brought to bee a pzale to the mightier sort, so that either their goods were souked from them, or else what was worse, their bodies were sent into farre Countries, to increase the riches of the great men that oppressed them, many when they had fulfilled their lust, and had got their maides with child, they sent them out to bee common harlots, all men in generall gaue themselves to drinking and gulfing, and in that kind of exercise they continued sometimes night & day. These vices made the Englishmen effeminate, & womanish, wherof it came to passe, that running headlong against Duke William, they lost themselves and their country, with one, and that an easie and light battaile.

To conclude, the Englishmen were then apparelled in garments to the mid knee, their haire rounded, and their beards shauen, all saue the vpper lip, their armes adozned with golden bracelets, and their skin marked, painted, and printed, at meat they forced themselves to sarfet, and dranke til they vomited, these last qualittes they dealed to them that overcame them, but I would not (saith mine author:) you should thinke I speake these euilles of all Englishmen, for I know that many of the Cleargie, did simply obserue the path of holinesse, and also of the lay people that did endeavour to serue God, &c.

Apparell of the English

When Duke William had gotten the full victory, he caused his men that were slaine to be buried, and also gaue leaue that if any man would they might burie their enemies in like manner, he gaue the body of Harold vnto Haroldes mother, at her request, taking no money, although by messengers she offered much, thus she receiuing his bodie, buried the same at Waltham in Cambridgeshire, in a Colledge which hee himselfe had founded to the honour of God and Saint Crosse, and had placed there a Deane and xi. Canons.

The death of Harold being knowne, Edwin and Morcar, two brethren of great towardnes, Charles, the one of Mercia, the other of Northumberland, which with their people had withdrawn themselves from the battaile, came now to London, and sending the Queene Edgitha, the late kinges sister vnto

the city of Chester, they solicited the citizens to erect either of them to the kingdome, which enterprize of theirs being frustrated, they departed into Northumberland, supposing that Duke William would neuer haue come thither. The rest of the nobles with the Citizens of London would haue erected Edgar the nephew of Edmond Ironside to the kingdome, and promised with him to giue a new batteile to Duke William, but through the danger that was at hand, and the discorde that was among themselves, they did neyther. So that the Englishmen if they had agreed together, might haue reformed the decay of their Countrey, but whilst they would haue none of their owne Countrey men to be king, they brought in a stranger. In this meane time Duke William determining to passe to London, turned south of the right waie, ouer the West coastes of England, wasting and destroying through Suffex, Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, & Barkeshire, till he came to Warringsford, or Wallingford, from thence he passed ouer the Riuer of Thamis, commanding his army to settle themselves there for a while, from thence he passed through Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hertfordshire, not ceasing to burne townes, and to slaie the people, till he came to Berkeham, or Berkehamstede, where staying for a time, (for cause as shal be shewed) thither came to him Aldred Archbyschop of Dork, Wolstane Byschoppe of Worcester, Wilshire Byschop of Hereford, Clito Edgare, and all other the noble men about London, with many other, who altogether submitted themselves giuing pledges, and sware fealtie vnto him, with whome also he made a league, but not withstanding he permitted his men still to burne townes, and to take spoyles.

Th. S. Albari Abbot of Saint Albones his policie against duke William.

The cause that Duke William staied at Berkehamstede, was this, there was at that time an Abbot of Saint Albones named Frederike, who when he hearde of duke William his comming into Hertfordshire, hee caused the woods belonging to his Church round about Saint Albones, and so in the waies towardes London to be felled, so that no man could passe that way for the trees that were layde crosse one ouer an other, and thus this Abbot for the time, kept his Monasterie from spoiling, for duke William coulde not come there, but was forced to coast about, to the Castell of Berkehamstede (as is afore sayd) whither vnder suretie he sent for Fretherike the Abbot, and demanded of him, why such felling of woods was made about him more then in other places: whereunto Frederike answered, and said, I haue done but as becommeth me, for if the Spirituall persons throughout this land had done their endeavour against thee as they mought and ought to haue done, it shoulde not haue bene in thy power to haue entered the land so farre: quoth duke William, is the spiritualitye of England of such power? If I may liue and enioy that which I haue gotten, I will make their power lesse, and especially I mind to begin with thee. The Abbot perceiuing hee had saide too farre, as soone as hee coulde departed home to his monasterie, where calling a chapter of his brethren, he told them of duke William, what he had said, and then taking his leaue of them, departed and went to the Isle of Gely, from whence he neuer returned to his Abbey.

When Gyffmaste approached, Duke William marched with all his armie towardes London, whose scouts comming together before him, to see the manner manner and behaviour of the people, found them assembled in the streets, determined to resist Duke William with all their might; but when the Duke came thither, he made a great slaughter of the Citizens, till perceiving themselves not able to resist him, they submitted themselves, and gave pledges unto him.

And thus ended the reign of the Saxons, who were first sent for by Vortiger king of the Brytaines, as is aforesaid, about the yere of our Lord 450. and had continued sometimes in wars with the Brytaines, then with the Danes, and now with the Normans the space of 600. yeres.

which he took on the Altar of S. Peter, where he promised before the Cleargie, and all the people, to defend the holy church of God, the Pastors thereof, and all the people subiect vnto him, he should iustlie gouerne: he should ordaine good lawes, and obserue true iustice, and to the bittermost of his power to withstand all rapines, and false iudgements.

This William was of a good stature, prowde of Port, verie coslie, and bigge bodied, with a cruell countenance, and a balde forehead, his bearde alwaies shauen, for so was the custome of the Normans, he had great strength in his armes, so that manie did wonder at him, because no man coulde draw his bowe, which hee would bende sitting on his horse backe, stretching out the string with his fote: hee made great and coslie feastes vpon high and principall daies, keeping his Christmas offering at Gloucester, his Easter offering at Winchester, and his Whitsun offering at Westminster, in eche place being crowned, and this he vsed euerie yeere so long as he continued in England. He caused all his nobles of what estate soeuer they were to come to those feastes, to the ende that the Embassadors of forreine countries might wonder at the sight of such a multitude of people and preparation of delicate, and daintie fare, and hee was at no time more courteous, or ready to grant pardon to anie that had offended, then at such times, onely couetousnesse of money was the thing, whereof he mought worthily be blamed.

Thomas Spot-
Wil. Thorne.

King William took his iourney towardes the Castle of Douer, to subdue that, and the countie of Kent: which when the Archbishop Stigand, and Eglefine the Abbot of Saint Augustines (being as it were the chiefeest Lordes and gouernours of all Kent) did perceiue and consider, that the whole Realme was in an euill state, and that whereas in this Realme of England, before the comming of the foresaide Duke William there were no bondmen, now all, as well noble men, as the common people, were without respect made subiect vnto the perpetuall bondage of the Normans, taking an occasion by the perill and danger that their neighbours were in, to prouide for the safeguard of themselves and their Countrey, they caused to assemble at Canterburie all the people of the Countie of Kent, and declared to them the perils and daungers imminent, the miserie that their neighbours were come into, the pride and insolencie of the Normans, and the hardnesse and grieue of bondage and seruile state: whereupon all the people rather choosing to ende their infortunate life, then to submit themselves to an vnaccustomed yoke of seruitude and bondage, with a common consent determined to maete duke William, and to fight with him for the lawes of their Countrey. And the foresaide Stigand, the Archbpy. Shoppe, and the Abbot Egelsin, choosing rather to die in battaile, then to see their nation in so euill an estate, being encouraged by the examples of the holy Macchabees, became Captaines of the armie. And at a date appointed all the people met at Swanescombe two miles west from Grauesende, and being hidden in the woods, lay patiently in waite for the comming of the foresaid Duke William. And because it can not hurt to be very wary in such cases, they agreed before hande, that when the Duke was come, and the passages on euerie

she stopped, to the end he should no waie be able to escape, euerie one of them, as well horsemen as footemen, should brace bowghes in their handes. The next daie after, when the duke was come into the fields & territories nere unto Swanecombe, and saue all the Countrey set and placed round about him, as it had bene a stirring and moving word, and that with a meane pace they approached and drew nere unto him, with great discomfiture of minde hee wondered at that sight. And as soone as the Captaines of the Kentishmen sawe that Duke William was inclosed in the middelt of their armie, they caused the Trumpets to be sounded, their banners to bee displayed, and theyr downe their bowghes, and with their bowes bent, their swordes drawne, and their speares and other kinde of weapons stretched forth, they shewed themselves ready to fight: Duke William and they that were with him, stood (as no marvaile it was) soze astonied, and amazed, and hee which thought that he had already al England fast in his fist, did now dispaire of his owne life. Therefore on the behalfe of the Kentishmen were sent unto Duke William, the Archbishop Scigand, and Egellin Abbot of Saint Augustines, who tolde him their message in this sort.

My Lorde Duke, beholde the people of Kent cometh forth to meete you, and to receive you as their liege Lord, requiring at your hands the thinges which pertaine to peace, & that under this condition, that all the people of Kent may enjoy for ever their ancient liberties, and may for evermore use the lawes and customes of their Countrey, otherwise they are ready presently to bidde battaile to you, and them that be with you, and are minded rather to die here altogether, then to depart from the lawes and customes of their Countrey, and to submit themselves unto bondage, whereof as yet they neuer had experience. The Duke seeing himselfe to be drawn into such a strait and narrow pinch, consulted a while with them that came to him, prudently considering, that if he should take any repulse or displeasure at the handes of this people, which be the key of England, all that euer hee had done before, should be undone againe, and of no effect, and all his hope and safetie should stand in daunger and leopordie: not so willingly as wisely hee graunted the people of Kent their request. So when the covenant was established, and pledges given on both sides, the Kentishmen being ioyful, conducted the Normans (who also were glad) unto Rochester, and yielded up to the Duke, the Earle dome of Kent, and the noble Castle of Dover. Thus the ancient liberties of England, and the lawes and customes of the Countrey, which be the coming of Duke William out of Normandy, were equally kept throughout all England, bee (through this industrie and earnest travell of the Archbishoppe Scigand and Egellin Abbot of Saint Augustines) remaine inuolubly observed untill this day, onely in the County of Kent. Thus saith Thomas Spor, after him William Thorne.

King William brought the Iewes from Boone to inhabite here: he receiued homage, oth of fidelitie, and pledges of the nobles, and commanded that in euerie towne and village a bell should be rung euerie night at eight of the clocke, and that all people should then put forth their fire and candle, and goe to bedde, which order was obserued through this Realme during his raigne, and the raigne of William his sonne. Thus were the English men forced to imitate the Normans in habite of apparell, shauing off of their beardes, seruice at the table, and in all other outward gestures.

The Historiographers of that time accompted the yere to begin at Christmas, after which accompt then beganne the yere 1067. but after the accompt of England nowe obserued, the yere beginneth not till the twentieth of March following.

And now because those houses maie not be forgotten vnto whom king W. disposed the landes and possessions of this Realme for their good seruice, I haue thought good to publish the names of them as heretofore I haue done, out of the Chronicles of Normandy, gathered by William Tayleur of Abbeane.

To wit, Odo Bishoppe of Baion: Robert Earle of Mortaigne: These two were brethren to Duke William by his mother: Bandonni de Buillon: Roger Earle of Beaumont, that was surnamed with the Beard, of him came the linage of Mellent.

William by-shop of London.

William Byshop, and Godfrey Portgreue and all the bourgeois of the Citie of London, in as large sort as they enjoyed the same, in the time of S. Edward before the conquest: in reward thereof, the Citizens haue fired on his graue, being in the middlest of the great West Ile of S. Pauls church in London, this Epitaph following:

*G*uilielmo viro sapientia & vita sanctitate claro, qui primum dino Edwardo regi & confessori familiaris, nuper in episcopum Londonensem erectus, nec multo post apud inuictissimum principem Guilielmum Anglia regem eius nominis primum, ob prudentiam fidemque singularem in consilium adhibitus, amplissima huic urbi celebrissima priuilegia ab eodem impetrauit: Senatus populûsque Londonensis bene merenti posuit. Sedit Episcopus Annos 20. Decessit anno à Christo nato 1070.

*Hæc tibi, clare pater, posuerunt marmoracines,

TH William a man famous in wisdom and holines of life, who first with S. Edward the king and Confessor being familiar, of late preferred to be bishop of London, and not long after for his prudence and sincere fidelitie, admitted to be of counsell with the most victorious Prince William king of England, of that name the first, who obtained of the same great and large priuiledges to this famous citie: The Senate and citizens of London to him ha- uing well deserued, haue made this. He continued Bishop twenty yeeres, and died in the yeere after Christ his natiuitie 1070.

These Marble monuments to thee thy Citizens assigne, Rewards (O Father) farr vnfit to those deserts of thine.
Thee vnto them a faithfull friend, thy London people found,
And to this towne, of no small weight, a stay both sure and sound:
Their liberties restorde to them, by meanes of thee haue beene,
Their publike weale by meanes of thee, large gifts haue felt and seene.

King William (leaving his brother Odo byshoppe of Bayon, and William Fitz Osborne whome he had made Earle of Hereford, to be wardens of Eng- land) returned into Normandie, which at that time was bent to shake from him. He took with him, Edgar Etheling, Stigandus archbishop of Canterburie, Frederike Abbot of S. Albons, Egelnothus Abbot of Glasenburie, Edwin Duke of Mercia, Morcarus Duke of Northumberland, Walden Earle of North- hampton hampton and Huntington, Roger late Earle of Hertford, Renulph Earle of Cambridge, Gospatrike Earle of Cumberland, Gualter the son of Siward, and many other nobles of England, thinking they would be truer to him in a forreine countrey then in their owne : by their diligence he subdued the rebelling Normans.

When winter was at hand, king William returned, and set an imposable tribute on the English men.

William Conquerour gave to Geoffrey Magnaule the Earldome of Essex, to the which Earldome, of aunient right belonged bearing of the kings standard, saith the Chronicle of Waltham.

After this, going into Devonshire, he besieged Excester, which the Citizens and other Englishmen held against him. The Countesse Githa mother of king Harold, and sister to Swano king of Denmarke with many other fleeing out of the Citie escaped, and got them over into Flanders, and the Citizens yielded to the king.

Mathild wife to king William came forth of Normandie, and on Whitson-daye, was consecrated Quene by Aldred Archbishop of Yorke, Marleswine, Gospatrike, and other noble men of Northumberland, to anoyde king Williams rough and boisterous dealing, and fearing to bee put in ward, taking with them Edgar Etheling, with his mother Agatha, and his two sisters, Margaret and Christian, went by sea into Scotland, where they were received, and well entertained of Malcolme king of Scots, who took Margaret the sister of Edgar to wife. King William with an army went to Nottingham, and there builded a Castell. He also went to Yorke, and there caused two Castles to be builded, and put in them garrisons: he commanded also Castles to be made at Lincoln, and in other places. Whiles these things were in doing, Godwine and Edmund furnished the Great, sons to king Harolde, returning forth of Ireland, landed in Sommersetshire, where Ednothus that was master of the horse to king Harolde, mette them with a great army, and fighting with them was slaine amongst many other. The two brethren having got the victorie, toke manie great prizes in Cornewall and Devonshire, and returned into Ireland.

It was the practise of king William to put the Englishmen into all places of danger, by that means to weaken their force : for against certaine English men that after the battel at Hastings fled into Denmark & Ireland, and came againe the third yere after with a great power, he set an English captain with an hoste of Englishmen, so both the armies fought, and brought the victorie to the king : the strangers were chased into Ireland, but with great slaughter of themselves, and losse of their capitaine Ednothus, a man excellent in the time of the English men, both at home in his own countrey, and also abroad. He was the father of Harding, who lived in the time of king Henry the second. Thus when the power of the lay people was overthrowen, he also established, that no Clarke of the English nation should be suffered to come to any promotion. He abhorred much the gentlenesse of Knouth which sometime had bene king of England, for that he restored the m, whome he had overcome, unto all their made knight.

But king William deposing them, distributed the Earldomes, Barones, Bishoppikes and dignities to his Normans: onely Hereward afoze mentioned in the yere of our Lord 1062. had reward with a prosperous end. For being in Flanders, and hearing, that the realme was subdued by strangers, and that his fathers inheritance (his father Leofrike being dead) was given to a Norman, and that his mother a widow was much troubled and injured, cometh with spede into England with his wife Thurfride, and gathering together a companie of his kindred, chased them out of his fathers inheritance. Then goeth to his uncle by the fathers side, then Abbot of Peterborough, and first making confession of his sinnes, and absolution received, watcheth all night in the Church, in prayers and fasting, and the next daie offered his sword upon the Altar: and after the Gospell, the Abbot put the same halowed sword about Herewards necke, with a benediction, and communicating the holy mysteries of Christ, from thenceforth remained a lawfull souldiour or knight.

This custome of consecration of a souldiour, the Normans abhorred: and not onely this custome, but manie other they did alter and change: for the English men making deedes and charters, which to the time of king Edward had bene firme, by the subscriptions of the faithfull with Crosses of Golde, and other holie seales, the Normans did condemne those charters and deedes, and appointed them to make their charters and deedes firme, with a printe, set upon waie by the speciall Seale of euerie one, vnder thre or foure witnessers.

At the first, many farmes and manors were given by bare wordes without writing: onely with the sword of the Lord, or his headpiece, with a horne, or standing goblet: and manie tenements, with a quill, with a horse combe, a bow, or arrow, to wit in the beginning of his raigne: but in the yeres after this manner was changed. They did so much abhorre the very speech, that the lawes of the land were pleaded in the French tongue. And boies in Scholes were taught their letters, and principles in Grammar in French, and not in English, &c.

Outlawes.
A customes.

Among the lawes of William Conquerour, there is one of the Church as followeth. If any man breake the peace of the Church violently, he is in the iurisdiction of the bishops to haue iustice, but if the partie that is guiltie, flee from it, or arrogantly refuse the Bishops order, the king within forty daies shall be enformed of it, who will presently take suretie of him, that he shall satisfie God first, and then the king: but if within thirtie daies hee can not bee found, the king by the wordes of his owne mouth shall outlawe him, and if after he be found, and maie be kept, he shall bee deliuered to the king alure, or els his head if hee defend himselfe, for hee beareth the head of a Wolfe, after the daie of his outlawie, this is the generall law concerning outlaws.

This yere Henrie the kings sonne was boine in England: his other sons, Robert, William and Richard were boine beyond the seas in Normandy, before he conquered England.

Anno reg. 3.
Henry the first boine.

King William gaue to Robert surnamed Cumin, the Earldome of Northumberland, of whose coming thither, when the men of that country heard, they made the themselves ready to forsake their houses, and to shift for themselves abroad: but sodainly there fell such abundance of snow, and roughnes of weather, that they could not in any wise flee, wherefore they took a device and concluded, either to flee the realme, or else to die all together for the libertie of the country. The which thing when the Bishop of Durham vnderstande, hee went out to meet the earle, and exhorted him to turne backe againe: but he suffering his souldiers to robbe and spoile, woulde not heare any counsell of health, but forthwith entred Durham with seuen hundred men, spoiling like enemies through the house of Durham every where that they listed for the time, which lasted not long, for on the next morning early the men of Northumberland being gathered together, burst open the gates, and running by and downe, slawe all that they found in that Citie, that took part with the Earle, whereby al the streets were filled with bloud and dead bodies: some there were that defended the entrie of the house, wherein the Earle was, and had thought to haue saued himselfe, but the other by fire endeuoured to burne the house, with al that were therein, whereby the west tower of the church was burnt, but through the wind that then blew out of the East, the church escaped burning: notwithstanding the house yet burning as it began, some of them that were within were burnt and other some, whilst they burst out to saue themselves, were immediately slaine, so that the Earle himselfe was dispatched, and all his souldiers sauing one that hardly escaped being wounded. King William taking great displeasure with these doings of the Northumbers, directed a certaine Duke with an army, to reuenge the slaughter of Earle Robert: but when they were come to Aluerton, and was in the next morning setting forward towarde Durham, there arose such a darkenesse of weather through thicknesse of clouds, that they could vnneth see one another, so that they could not find their waie, whereupon they returned, and so it came to passe, God hauing pittie vpon them, that they heard of the departure of their enemies before they heard of their coming towards them.

Lib, Duncelm.

About the same time, by the testimonie of an old Chronicle in the Librarie Lib. Richmond, at Richmond, King William gaue such a gift of lands as followeth:

I William king, the third yeere of my raigne, Giue to the Norman Hunter, to me that art both life and deere,
The Hop and the Hopton, and all the boundes vp and downe, Vnder the earth to hell, aboute the earth to heauen,
From me, and from mine, to thee, and to thine,
As good, and as faire, as euer they mine were:
To witnes that this is sooth, I bite the white waxe with my tooth,
Before Iugge, Mawde and Margery, and my youngest sonne Henry,
For one bow and broad arrow, when I come to hunt vppon Yarrow.

Lib. Ebor.
The Danes inuade England.

Some what before the feast of the natiuitie of our blessed Ladie, Harold and Canutus sonnes to Swamus king of Denmarke, Earle Esborne, Earle Turkel-lus, Christerne their bishop, and many other, with 204. ships comming forth of Denmarke, landed in the mouth of the riuer Humber, where Clito Edgar, earle Waltheus, and Merleswine, with many other, and the naute which they had as-sembled came to them, of whose comming Aldred Archbishop of Yorke being verie sorrowfull, made earnest intercession to almighty God, that he might not see the bitter ruine and destruction of his countrey, sell sick, and ended his life in the yere next following, as shall be shewed.

The eight day after the landing of the Danes, to wit, on the nineteenth day of September, the Normans that kept the Castle of Yorke, fearing least the houses that were nere to the Castle should be a furtherance to the enemies, to fill up the ditches, beganne to set fire on them, and to burne them up: which fire encreasing too exceedingly, invaded all the Citie, and consumed the Monas-terie of S. Peter, together with the city, but this acte was grievously reuenged on them very speedily, for before all the city was burnt, the Danish navy came, to wit, on the Monday, being the 21. of September, and breaking the castles, the same day slew above 3000. Normans, sauing William Mallet and his wife, two of their children, and fewe other: which done, they returned to their ships with innumerable booties. Which doing, when it was signified to the king, he forthwith assembled an army, & hasted with an angry minde towards Northumberland, not ceasing to waste that Countrey all that winter, to kill men, and to doe all the mischief that was possible. In the meane time, mes-sengers being sent to the Danish Earle Esborne, king William promised to giue to him no small summe of money, and to permit his army freely to take victuals, by the sea coast, with this condition onely, that winter being past, hee should depart without battell. Esborne being too greedy of golde and siluer, not without great shame, yielded to his requests, and departed without more claime of this kingdome for that time.

King William
compoundeth with the Danes to depart without battaile.

By reason that the Normans had wasted England in Northumberland, and in certaine other places in the yere before, nowe this yere, and the next that followed, such a dearth encreased through all England, especially through Northumberland, and the countries next adioyning, that men were faine to eate horse flesh, cattes, dogges, and mans flesh: for all the land that lay betwixt Durham and Yorke, laye waste without inhabitantes, and people to till the ground, for the space of nine yeres, except onely the territorie of Saint Iohn of Beverlake.

A great dearth
so that mans flesh was eaten
of men.

When Eglefine Byschoppe of Durham hearde of the comming of King VVilliam, hee and the elders taking aduise together, fledde to the Church of holy Iland: but in the meane season the kings armie being scattered through- out all places whatsoever betwixt Tese and Tine, found nothing but emp- tie houses euerie where: and then was burnt the Church of Saint Paule at Parrolo.

Anno reg. 4.

The Church of Durham being bereft of all ecclesiasticall service, was lesse like a desert, but Lent being at hand, when peace was made, the bishop retur- ned ned againe, and entred the church the first of Aprill, where he found the Image of the Crucifer cast to the ground, and altogether spoiled of the ornaments. Though the counsell of William Fitz Osberd Earle of Hereford, and certaine other, in the Lent season king William caused the monasteries of all England to be searched, and the money which the richer sort of the English people, for the cruell spoiling which they saw in him had laide by in the same Abbeies, he caused to be brought into his treasure. Roger of Wendouer saith, he bereaved all the Monasteries and Abbeies in England, of their golde and silver, sparing neither Chalis nor Shrine, appropriating the said monasteries and Abbeies to himselfe: he brought under knights service, all those Bishopricks and Abbeies that held baronies, which had bene free from all secular bondage, appointing them how many souldiers they should finde him and his successors in time of warres.

A great counsell was holden at Winchester by commandement of the king, who also was present at the same, Pope Alexander consenting therunto, sent by his Legates Eumenius bishop, and the Priests, John and Peter Cardinals of the sea Apostolike, who exhibited there his authoritie. In which counsell Stigand Archbishop of Canterburie was degraded for thre causes, to wit, because he did possesse unlawfully the bishopricke of Winchester, together with his archbishopricke, and because that whilst the Archbishop Robert was yet living, he had not only taken vpon him the archbishopricke, but also in celebrating of diuine service, for a time vsed the Pall, which remained at Canterbury, when he was expelled unlawfully by violence out of Englande, and after received the Pall of Benedict, whom the church of Rome did excommunicate, for that hee had invaded the Apostolike See by money. His brother also Agelwine Bishop of the East Angles, and diuers Abbots were there degraded by the kings meanes, that other of his nation might be placed in their roomes, for the confirmation of his kingdom, many, aswell Bishops as Abbots, who for no evident cause were deprived of their honour, and by the king vnto their lines end holden in prison.

When the feast of S. Iohn Baptist was at hand, Earle Esborne with his navy which had wintered in Humber, (according to appointment made) returned into Denmarke, but his brother Swain king of Denmarke banished him that realme, for the money which (against his will, and the will of the Danes) hee had receiued of king William: whereby it appeareth, that Swaine K. of Denmarke surceased not his claime to the crowne of England, as some haue affirmed, namely in a table, vntruly intituled, The true portraiture of the countenances, and acties of the Kings of England, &c. collected by T. T. wherein his wordes be these, Will. of Normandie, &c. took the crowne vpon him by election of the estates (the contrarie whereof is true) then seeking to stoppe titles, he imprisoned Edgare Echeling, the onely true heire of the Saxons blood, and by meanes of Ethelbert Archbishop of Hamborow, for money procured Swaine king of Denmarke to surcease the claime of the Danes; hauing thus established his affaires, &c. which erreur the saide T. Marke how little this authour scrueeth to his interpretation, and now to our historie.

King William having placed a Canon of Bayon, named Thomas the elder, in the Archbishops See of Poike, doth also now call for Lanfranke Abbot of Cane in Normandie, that was a Lombard, borne in the citie of Papia, a man skillfull in science, prudent in counsell and gouernment of thinges, and for religion and life most holie, him he made Archbishop of Canterburie. This Lanfranke being consecrated archbishop of Canterburie, he consecrated Thomas Archbishop of Poike, but not before he had made profession of subiection to the said Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, which the said Thomas was obeyed by the king to do, and did before his consecration.

Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie being in such fauour with king William, that the same William thought not good to deny any thing that he requested, procured by his industrie that the said king left his euill custome of selling his prisoners, which he toke in Ireland: which was a thing hardly granted to him, and to Wolstane Bishop of Worcester, the gaines that the king had by the sale of these Irishmen was such.

The Carles, Edwine of Mercia, Morcare of Northumberland, Siward surnamed Bran, Eglewine Bishop of Durham, with many knights and souldiours, both of the cleargie and lay people, fearing that king William would put them in prison, secretly fled out of the court, and for a time rebelled against him, till they perceiued the thing they had taken in hand, went not well with the m, and then Carle Edwine determining to goe to Malcolme king of Scots, was in the way thitherward slaine through treason of his owne people.

Eglewine bishop of Durham, Carle Morcare, Siward surnamed Bran, and Hereward, a right valiant person, with many other, went into woods and wild places of the countrey, because they were not able to abide the force of king William: and after they had done much harme in many places, at the last, they came into the Ile of Ely by boate, and chose there a place in the fennes, they make Hereward their Captaine of the warre, where hee did manie warlike feates, so often overcoming his enemies, so manie times deluding them, that he deserved perpetuall commendations, for as long as he could, he sustained the ruines of his countrey decaying.

Whereof when as king William was aduertised, hee gathered a great power, marched thitherward, and stopped their going out of the Ile on the East side thereof, and caused a bridge or causeway of two miles in length to be made in the West part. Hee also (saith Roger of Wendouer) builded a Castle from the ground vpp, in a place called Wilsbech. Whereupon they of the Ile perceiuing themselves so inclosed, they raised a fforte or Castle of turkes and timber in the marshes, which by the inhabitantes of that countrey, is called the Castle of Hereward: this castle they raised against the assaulting assaulting of the kings hoste, and fought with their enemies many daies together. From thence the king went to the castle of Grantbridge, from whence, as the necessitie of the time required, set forth diuers companies to besiege and trouble the next places vnto the Ile, for the king himselfe was called vnto other businesse, and enforced to repaire into Normandie, to speake with Philip king of France. In the meane time Hereward, and the nobles of England obtained by price, which they were not able to doe by prayer, and won the Scots to take their part against the Normans. And also the Danes fauouring them, did greatly desire to triumph ouer the Normans. Further, there were within the Realme great commotions on euerie part, as well by the Normans, as other against the king, by perswasion of Earle Rasse de Walser, calling Hereward into that faction, and others the nobles of England, as Morcar, Ethelm, Waltheum, Siward, and Edgare. At which time Hereward leauing the Ile of Ely, committed to him for safegard, went towards the English, to whom a valiant company of young souldiers did ioyne themselves, which no man durst encounter.

Malcolme king of Scots with an innumerable multitude of Scots, passing through Cumberland, and turning aside towards the East, did cruelly forrage all Westdale, and the places nigh adioyning: but when they came to a place called Hundresfeld, after they had there slaine certaine noble men of the English nation, the king of Scots sent home part of his army laden with spoiles. Then he set vpon Holderneshe and destroyed the same with a sodaine desolation: then raging through the grounde of Saint Cuthbert of Durham, he cruelly depriued all men of their goods, and manie of their liues. At the same time also did he consume with fire, the Church of Saint Peter at Weremouth, and diuers other Churches, with them that were thither fledde to saue themselves. And whiles the saide Malcolme rode about the riuer bankes, delighting his eyes with the cruell actes committed against the English people: it was tolde him that Edgar Etheling with his sisters of the blond royall, and manie other noble men, banished from their lawfull inheritance, were arrived at that haue: he came to them, and shaking hands with them, gaue them and all theirs licence with his assured peace to dwell in his kingdome as long as they would.

Besides these robberies of the Scots, Gospatrike of Northumberland did assaile Cumberland, and made there great slaughter and burnings, and after returned with great bottie, to a strong fortreffe at Babbanburgh, where hee with his fellows inclosed themselves: for at that time Cumberland was vnder the iurisdiction of king Malcolme, who when he heard what was done by Gospatrike, he charged his souldiours to spare none of the English nation: whereupon, pitifull it was to beholde, olde men, and women, some were killed with swordes, some pierced with speares, the young babes taken from the mothers pappes were cast vp into the aire, and falling downe againe, were receiued on their speares, and then the speare shaftes striken into the ground in a bushment together: but the young men and maidens, such as were thought meete to labour, were bound, and forced to be slaves. I knowe
prooued that the archbishop of Yorke should be subiect to the archbishop of Canterburie.

At this time (saith Houeden) Scotland was so replenished with bondslaves, men and women of the English nation, that no village or cottage could be found without them.

The Castle of Leeds in Kent was builded by Creuicure, a noble man, a Norman.

The Castle of Orford was builded by Robert de Olly the first, a noble man that came into England with king William the Conquerour.

Also William Earle Warren, that came in with William the Conquerour, and married Gundred daughter to the saide William, this yere founded the Priorie of Lewes in Sussex.

This yere, by the commaundement of Pope Alexander, and consent of King William the Conquerour, in the presence of the saide king, his bishops, Prelates, and nobilitie, the title of Primacie, the which Lanfranke Archbishoppe of Canterbury did claime ouer the Church of Yorke, and concerning the ordering of certaine Bishops, whome men were vncertaine vnto which Archbishoppe they shoulde especially belong, was examined and tried out: where, by the authoritie of olde Writings it was prooued and declared, that the Church of Yorke ought to bee subiect vnto the Church of Canterbury, and ought faithfully to obey the same, in all matters pertaining vnto Christe an Religion, as being Primate of all England. And the Archbishop of Canterbury, as Metropolitane, graunted the Archbishop of Yorke and his successors, to haue vnder their iurisdiction, the bishopricke of Durham, that is to saie, Lindisferne, and from the great Riuer of Humber vnto the uttermost part of the borders of Scotland, and also all whatsoever doeth appertaine to the parish of Yorke vpon the side the Riuer, so that if the Archbishop of Canterburie doe summon a counsell in any place, the Archbishop of Yorke and all his Suffraganes, Subiects and Clerkes shall be there present at his commaundement, and shall be obedient vnto his canons and orders, &c. at Windsor.

went into Scotland, and Malcolme
king of Scots
did homage
vnto him.

King William having in his companie Edrike surnamed Syluaticus, or Wilde, marched towarde Scotland with a nauie by Sea, and with an armie of horsemen by land, to haue subdued Scotland, for that Malcolme had in the yere last before passed, so cruelly desolated the borders of his kingdom.

In the which iourney, when king William came vnto Durham, hee entered the Church with great deuotion for to pray, and afterwarde hee inquiring of the life and conuersation of the Confessor Cuthbert, and also of the antiquitie of that Bishopricke, hee confirmed all the Liberties of that same Church, &c.

This being done, King William went into Scotland, against whome King Malcolme came vnto a place called Aberinthey, and became his man. And after king William depriued Gospatrike of his Earledome, laying vnto his charge, that he had consulted with them that helpe the Earle Robert Co-

men of Durham, and that hee was among the enemies, when the Normans were slaine at Hoxhe: who being erpulsed, Walcheus was extolled unto that Earledome, being bre vnto him both by father and mother, for he was the son of Earle Siward by Elfred the daughter of Aldred sometime Earle.

At the same time when king William returned from Scotland, he builded a Castle at Durham, wherein the Bishop might keepe him and his safe, from such as made assautes. Castle at Durham builded.

This yere Eglewine Bishop of Durham, who had bene by king William committed to prison first at Abindune, and since at Westminster deceased, and was buried there in S. Nicholas chappell.

King William went into Normandie, which Duke dome was then rebellious against him, but with strong hand he subdued the Citie of Mayne, and the whole Countrey, especially by the helpe of Englishmen, whome he applied in these affaires, they spoiled the cities, to wnes, vineyards, and corne fields, whereby they greatly weakened and empouderished that prouince. Clito Edgar at this time came south of Scotland, and passing through England, went into Normandy, and was there agreed with king VWilliam. Annoreg. 7.

Clito Edgar.

About this time the Monkes of Ely, seeing the miseries of themselves, and of the whole Island, determined to trie the kings clemencie, for there was such a dearth in the land, as the like had not bene seene, for al prouision being spent, many thousands died through hunger, since it was now the seventh yere since they had bene besieged, wherfore taking their iourney to Warwike a famous towne, they came to the king with great reuerence, commending themselves, and all that they had to his clemencie. Thurstan and his Monkes standing befoze king William, beseeched him for the mercy of God to turne his displeasure from their Citie, promising faithfully hereafter to obey him. The Abbot said, that if the king would restore vnto the Abbey their possessions, violently taken from them, hee might haue sure entrance into the Ile: which the king granted, and commanded William de Warren, and Gilbert de Clare, that they shoulde become pledges for the same. Whereupon the Abbot conferred with them about the regathering together of their possessions, who (going after to his owne) did first instruct Gilbert de Clare, and Earle VVarren of the manner of the rebellion, willing them not to feare for the often repulse of the enemies, for they shoulde haue his counsell and helpe, whereby the king might vnderstand that the power of the enemies was weakened. The Monkes of Ely submit themselves to king William.

Whereupon the king began to triumph, as though he had already got the victorie: hee assembled therefore as great an armie as he could both of horsemen and footemen, he toke his iourney to Ely, he prepareth his engines, layeth siege to the place which was of most defence, and daily laboured to ouerthrow that which Canutus neither with wit, or strength, with policie, or sword could at any time subdue.

At length, though with difficulty wonderful to be declared, he safely brought his army nêrer then anie one thought he could haue done, which was euen to the waters of Ely, the Normans passed Cotinglade, neither did it grieue the king first to passe ouer many riuers, although he was almost drowned at the point point Gale: hee ceased not for marshes or other neuer so dangerous, till the sounding voice of victorie quickly dyaue the enemies out of the Island, but the Normans compassing the enemies, did in a moment slae a thousand of them, wherefore the king as soone as he had entred the Island, went about the mores, marshes, and crooked waies, and doth with siege inclose the whole company of his enemies. These armed men are brought forth, first the Captaines, then the better sort of the other, whereof he imprisoneth some, and put out the eyes, cut off the hands and feete of other some, and suffered the multitude of the common people to depart.

his off. ring to
of Ely.

In this Ile he found abundance of beaſts and cattell manifolde to recompence his slaime horses and other domages. Edwine is taken, and with him many persons of name & power, who were bound in streit prison, but Worcester was escaped: forthwith the king sent a great company to keepe the gates of the monastery, to the end the Monks with crosses and other ceremonies should not make him, and entreate for pardon at his hand, whereunto hee must needs haue graunted. Wherefore when he came to the monastrie, he stode aloofe from the tombe of Saint Etheldred, and hurled a marke of golde vpon the Altar. Which done, and hauing placed a garrison within the walles of the Monkes: he disposed of Grantbidge, Huntington, and Bedford shires, committing them to such men as he had brought out of France: and likewise placing a strength of Frenchmen in the Castle of Alrehed, he went out of the Island, the same way by which he entred into it: there was no disaine service since that vnto the xxvii. of Daober, the time was so troublesome. After the king was departed, the Church doores were fast locked: and Gilbert de Clare entered the monastery to see the monks places of offices, in the end came into the refectory, & finding the Monks at dinner, said to them, Oh wretches and slothfull persons, had you none other time to dine in, but whilst the king remained in your Church: With which wordes they all rising, ranne to the Church: but when they found not the king there, they were greatly troubled: wherefore hauing no hope but in God, they required Gilbert de Clare, that by his meanes they might obtaine a firme peace, which in the ende taking vpon him to doe, he went to the king, and with great difficultie obtained the same: with condition, that when the Monkes came befoze him, they should by prayer or price pacifie his displeasure against them,

King William
lay at Wich-ford.

Money paid
by weight.

This done, he brought the Monkes befoze the king to Wichford, where he then sojourned, who being with much adoe brought in fauour with the king by the saide Gilbert, and other noble men, promised seven hundred markes of silver. For the providing whereof, the Monkes were enforced to spoile and sell the treasures and ornaments of their Church, and then repayre to Grantbidge to paze that money to the kings officers: but one groat being lacking of the said summe, by the deceit of such as did tell it, the waight was not tust, by so much. Whereof when the King had vnderstode, hee was greatly offended with them, denying vnto them all manner of hope of ante further peace. Whereupon they were dynen to make an other composition of a thousand markes, for the which they were saue for to spoile, and to sell whatsoeuer whatsoever other kind of ornaments that were left, and yet notwithstanding, lacked that peace which they so much sought, and so dearly bought. Walter bozne at Exetere, was elected by the king, and then consecrated Bishop of Durham.

King William the Conquerour with a great power of Englishmen went into Normandie, which rebelled, and subdued it, spoiling the cities, townes, vineyardes, &c.

Gregorie the seventh, Pope, excommunicated all committees of Symonte, and reuocued married Priests from executing diuine Service, whereof rose great troubles in England.

Radulph whom lately before king William had made Earle of Herefolke and Suffolke, or, as some write, of the East Angles, now he took to wife (against the kings commaundement) the daughter of William Fitz Osbert, sister to Roger Earle of Hereford, and celebrating most royally the marriage feast, with a great multitude of noble men at Erningham in Gantebidge shire, concealing a pride of his marriage, for that his wife was the kinges kinswoman, even upon the marriage daie, when the feast was solemnly kept, and the riotous superfluity of the Englishmen was entred into the Normans throates, the guests being drunken and full of wine, with a long circumstance of words, he opened his minde and purpose, whereunto the guests consented with a great shout. There was Roger Earle of Hereford, Radulphes wifes brother: there was Waldeous Earle of Northampton and Huntingdon, and many other, who all conspired the kings death. But on the next morrow, when the heat of the wine was digested, and the mindes of some of them came to better temper, the most part of them repented of that they had promised, and slipping away from the feast, Waldeous as soon as hee could went to Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury, and took penance for his othe which he had receined against his will, and through his aduise went to the king, then being in Normandie, and opening the matter vnto him, yielded to his mercie. The other Nobles proceeding in their begunne conspiracie, went to their Castles, and raised their people to open rebellion. But Wolsane Bishop of Worcester, with a great bande of men of warre resisted the Earle of Hereford, so that hee might not (passing the River of Seuerne) come to Earle Radulph at the appointed place with his campe, in whose companie was Aglewine Abbot of Guelham, with his people, hauing called to his aide Vrse Sheriffe of Worcester, and Walter de Lacie with their men, and other multitudes of common people.

Earle Waltheofus also was committed to prison, although that hee went to the king, and had obtayned of him a promise of pardon.

Crute the sonne of Swaine, and Hacon the Earle came out of Denmarke with two hundred ships full of men of warre: but when they hearde that their santoners were overcome, and banquished, they turned their backs, and sailed into Flanders, and durst not fight with king William: but William of Malmesburie saith that king William did likewise by the earle Hacon, as befoze he had by the earle Elborne.

At this time moreover, to encrease the calamitie, happened the cruel beheading of earle Waltheof or Walden: and although Lanfranke Archbyschoppe of Canterburie his Confessor, affirmed him to be free from the conspiracy and faction, and that if it chanced him to die in that case, he should for his innocencie be counted a martyre, yet his most wicked wife, coueting to be married anewe, did most hainously hasten the death of her husband. For hither came two brethren to the aide of the king, and to serue him with forty soldiers horsemen, their names were Guarnerus le Riche, and Simon de Seintliz, and their fathers name was Ranulph le Riche, after whose death the eldest son, Guarnerus went backe into his natie Countrey, and succeeded in his fathers possessions: but Simon the younger sonne remained here with the king, vnto whom the king gaue the Towne of Northampton, and the Hundred of Jackesley, hee builded the Castle of Northampton, and also the Abbey of Saint Andrewes there. When I had profited in reading Aristotle aboue manie mine equals in age, I studied also Tullies Rhetoriques: waring elder, loathing the base estate of my parents daily more and more, I desired to leaue my father and mothers house, and to be in kings and princes pallaces, to be attired in silkes and go- gious apparell. And beholde, noble William, nowe our king of England, then Duke of Normandie, came to London, to talke with his cousin king Ed- ward then king of England, with a great traine attending vpon him, vnto whome I soone toynd my selfe, thrusting forward, to dispatch all businesse arising, I became in a little time knowne to Duke William, and was of him herie well beloued, and with him I sayled into Normandie, there was I made his Secretarie, I ruled the whole court of the Duke at my pleasure, to the en- uie of manie.

At what time duke William understanding of the death of king Edward his cousin expected a fauourable wind in the port of Saint Walarike, to saile ouer into England, I presented vnto him the Abbots gift, to wit, twelue yong men chosen on Horsebacke and armed, with an hundred markes towards his expences in that voyage, and I returned to the Monasterie. Walter Biſhop of Durham, borne in Lorraine as is aforeſaide, is ſlaine by the Northumbers, in a place called Gateſhed, in reuenge of a Noble man named Leulfus, befoze ſlaine by meanes of the Biſhoppes Chaplaine named Leofwinus. The ſayde Leulfus in manie partes of England intoyed great poſſeſſions by right of inheritance, but becauſe the Northmans euerie where practiſed their cruelty, he got himſelfe with all his family to Durham, he had to wiſe Algiſtha, daughter to Earle Aldred, of whome hee begate two ſonnes Vred and Morcare.

ing out of the court house, or mete hall called vnto him Gilbert, a man to whom the byshop had committed the earledome of Northumberland vnder him to be gouerned, he requiſed him to reuenge his diſpleaſure againſt the ſaid Leulfus, and as ſone as he could to put him to death, which hee performed in this manner, gathering together his men of warre, one night went vnto the billage where Leulfus dwelt, and there in his owne houſe, together wiſh all his family, ſlew him, which thing being knowne, the Byſhoppe ſoze bered in diſpleaſure there wiſh, toke his hode from his head, threwe it to the ground, and ſaide to Leofwine his Chaplaine, theſe thinges are done by thy meanes Leofwine, and therefore I will that thou know for certaine that thou haſt killed me, and al my familie wiſh the ſword of thy tongue. Hauing this ſaid, he got him ſtraight into the Caſtell, and forthwiſh ſending meſſengers through Northumberland, he cauſed to be declared to all men, that he was nothing priuie to the death of Leulfus, but was now deſirous to baniſh his ſlaier Gilbert and all his fellows in that action, and for himſelfe he was ready to purge himſelfe according to the Eccleſiaſtical lawes. This being ſignified, the Byſhop and the friends of him that was ſlaine, profeſſing to be at peace together, appointed a day and place of meeting together, where they might eſtabliſh a more firme peace; now when the day came, they met at the place appointed, but the Byſhop reſuſing to talke wiſh them abroad, abode in the Church thereby wiſh his Cleargy and knights, and when the talke was began, once or twice he ſent out to them of his counſailers, to make an attonement, but they would not agree, becauſe they beleued that Leulfus was ſlaine by the Byſhops conſent, for the night after the ſlaughter of Leulfus, not onelie Leofwine did receiue Gilbert and his complices into his houſe familiarlie, but alſo the Byſhoppe did the like. Whereupon, all thoſe that were found out of the Byſhops place they ſlew, berie ſelue excepted, that gate a waie by flight, which thing perceiued by the Byſhoppe, he to ſatiſfie the furie of his enimies, commanded his conſin Gilbert (whoſe life was ſought) to depart out of the Church, whome as hee went, the men of armes followed wiſh ſpeare and ſword, till they had ſlaine him and all the ſe enimies, ſparing onlie two Engliſhmen that were ſeruants to the Byſhop, they alſo ſlew Leofwine the Deane of Durham, and other of the Prieſtes, as they coulde finde them out of the Church. When the Byſhop perceiued that by no meanes the ſe fury might be pacified, except the head of the autho: were cut off, he beſought Leofwine to go forth, which when hee coulde not get him to doe, hee went himſelfe to the Church doores, and beſought them to graunt him his life, which when they reſuſed to doe, hee couering his head wiſh the ſkirt of his garment, went forth, and ſtraightwaies wiſh the enimies ſwordes hee was diſpatched out of his life: after this they bade Leofwine come forth, but hee would be not, whereupon they ſet the Church walles and rouſſe on fier, which hee continued a while, but when he felt the bitter flames about him, and began to ſmart, he lept out, and being cut in peeces, ſuffered for his wickednes.

This deteſtable ſlaughter of the Byſhop was committed on the 14. daie of May, when he had ſate Byſhop nine yeeres, and two monethes, the Monks of Warrow ſailed to the place, toke the bodie of their Byſhop into their ſhippe, which

The said Odo took certaine ornaments of the Church, among the which there was a Bishops staffe, marueilous for the matter and workmanship, for it was made of Saphyre stone, who hauing set a garrison in the Castell returned.

King William for the taxing of his whole lande, took this order in all England, there was not an hide of land, but he knewe the valewe thereof, and the possessor also, neither metrenor place there was, but it was valued in the kings role, the rents and profits, the possession and the possessor, were made manifest and knowne unto the king, according to the fidelitie of taxors, which being chosen out of euerie Countrey, taxed or seised their owne Territories, or made their owne rent role. These men well willers and friends to our Monasterie, weighed not our Monasterie to the full pise, nor to the true measure thereof, preventing and prouiding vpon zealous affection towarde vs, for the kinges taxations, and other burdens that after might befall.

This role is called the role of Winton, and of the Englishmen for the generalitie thereof, containing wholie all the tenements of the whole land, it is named Domesdate. Such a role and very like, did king Aelfred once set forth, in which he taxed all the land of Englande by Shires, Hundreds, and Tythings.

And this role, as is before noted, was called the role of Winton, because it was laide in Winchester to bee kept. Which Citie was the head of the West Saxons kingdome, comming vnto him by inheritance: At this time among all the particular kingdomes of England most noble and famous. In this role of Winchester, so most of all called, because it was made after the example of the other, were taxed and set downe, the Earledomes, Hundreds, Tythings, Woods, Parks, and all Farmes, in euery territozy, or precinct, howe manie carneates of lande, howe manie ploughlandes, and acres, what pastures and fennes, or marishes, what tenements and tenants were contained, &c. This Richard King Williams seconde sonne was a goodly ladde, and such a one as of his age did attempt great matters, in whome his noble father had a very good opinion: but a bitter death did sone deuour him in his yong age, men said that the Dêre in the new Forrest, by reason of a cloude or mist of infected aire, got a disease of gozing, and so spoiled him. This new Forrest is a place which king William the father of Richard, had laid wast, overthrowing townes, villages, and Churches, by the space of 30. miles and more, bringing the same into a chafe for dère, an horrible thing it was to see, that where before men did inhabite and dwell, and where God was honozed: now Dêre, Goates, and such other kind of wild beasts do wantonly course about, & not so much as made to the use of men. Wherefore it is declared for certaine, that in the same Forrest, William his son, and his nephew Richard the son of Robert Duke of Normandy, did by the seuerer iudgement of God find their death, Wil. with an arrow that was shot in his breast, and Richard had his neck broken, or as some say, as he rode through the wood on horse backe, he was hanged by by the chaps upon the bough of a tree.

King William in his life time shewed great fauour vnto his mother, who before his father was dead, had married a certain man of mean substance called Herlewinus of Canteruile, by him king William had brethren, one named Robert, whome he made Earle of Mortou, a grosse and dull witted man: The other brother was called Odo, who when he was Duke, he promoted to the Bp. shoppicke of Bayon, and when he was king, he made him Earle of Kent, he being a man of subtil wit, was vnder the king Vice- lord of al England, after the death of William fitz Osberne, insomuch that hee being wonderfull craftie and subtil in heaping vp of treasure, and one of a maruellous obstinacie, being absent from the citizens of Rome, had almost bought the Papacy by stuffing the bagges of straungers with letters and money. And (by reason of the opinion, that all men had of him, that he should go to Rome to bee Pope) all matters of controuersie throughout the whole Realme were brought vnto him, which matter the king toke verie euill, and laid him in prison as shall be shewed in place conuenient, saying that he would not apprehend the Bishop of Bayon, but that he would apprehend the Earle of Kent, his seruantes being constrained thereunto with threats, he wated such plenty of golde, that the heape of yellow mettall did excede the opinions of all men: moreover, mane bagges full of grounden gold were drazoned out of Riuers, which hee had buried in certaine places.

Odo Bp.
Bishop of Bayon.

About this time many tempests raging in this world, certain Southsaiers of Rome declared, who should succede vnto Hildebrand in the Popedom, they affirmed after the decease of Gregorie, Odo to bee Pope of Rome. Odo Bishop of Bayon, hearing this, who (with his brother) governed the Normanes and Englishmen, little esteeming the power and riches of the West kingdome, vntlesse by right of the Popedom, he might largely rule all the inhabitants of the earth, he sendeth to Rome, he buyeth a pallace, he seeketh out the Senators, whome with great giftes giuen he soyne with him in amitie, and his pallace he adorne with much cost, and superfluous trimmings, he sendeth for Hugh earle of Chester, and a great company of the chiefe knights, and hartely prayeth them to goe with him into Italy: and the prodigall man, vnto his praers addeth great promises. They, for that the Normans were light, and desirous to see foraine Countries, straightwaies assented vnto the presumptuous Bishoppe, to whome the Princesdome of Albion, and Normandie sufficed not, and consented also to forsake their huge lundes, which they possessed in the West Climate, and promised by their faith to accompany the foresaide Prelate beyond the Riuer of Doo. Prudent king William, when he heard of such great preparation, allowed not thereof, but thought it to bee hurtfull to his kingdome, and many others, wherefore he hastily sayleth into England, and suddenly vnloked for in the Ile of Wight met with Odo the Bishoppe, now desirous with great pompe to saile into Normandie, and there the chiefe of his Realme being gathered together in the kings hall, the king spake in this sort.

Vita W. Con.

King William
returneth from Normandy to the Ile of Wight.

This Oration
to his nobles,

Excellent Pères, hearken my wordes diligently, and I beseech you giue vnto mee your wholsome counsaile. Before I sailed ouer the Sea into Normandie I commended the gouernment of England to my brother the Bishop of Bayon.

In Normandie manie haue risen bp against me, and, as I may say, inward friends, and foraine foes haue invaded mee, Robert my sonne, and certaine younglings, whome I haue brought bp, and to whome I haue giuen armes, rebelled, and my false clientes, and bozdering enemies cleaued vnto them, but they profited nothing, God whose seruant I am, defending me: neither yet obtained they any thing of mine, but prou in their wounds.

They of Angeow gathered together against me, whom with feare of preparation to warres I pacified, with these businesses I haue bene prouoked beyond the Sea, and there I haue staide long, and laboriously haue giuen all my endenour to publike commodities. In the meane time my brother hath greatly oppressed England, and hath spoiled the Churches of their lands, and rents, hath made them naked of the ornaments giuen by our predecessours, and hath seduced my knights, who ought to defend England against the Danes, Irishmen, and other enemies ouertroublesome vnto me, and condemning me purpose to traine them out beyonde the Alpes into foraine kingdomes, an ouer great dolour grieneth my heart, especiallie for the Churches of God which he hath afflicted.

Christian kings that haue reigned before mee, haue loued the Church of God, with honours and gifts of manie kindes, they haue enriched it, wherfore now (as we beleue) they rest reioycing with a happy retribution in a pleasant seate. Adelbert, and Edward, Saint Oswald, Althulph, Aelfred, Edward the elder, and Edgar, and my cousin and most deare Lozde Edward haue giuen riches vnto the holy Church the spouse of God, and my brother to whom I haue committed the gouernement of the whole kingdome, violently plucketh away their goods, cruelly oppresseth the poore, with a vaine hope, sleaeth alwaie my knights from me, and hath exasperated the whole Realme, by oppressing it with vniust tarations. Consider you toozthly what is to bee done hereupon, and I beseech you insinuate it vnto me.

And when all they fearing so great a personage, doubted to pronounce sentence against him, the valiant king saide, hurtfull rashnesse is alwaies to bee repressed, oftentimes heretofore hee straued against his father, and then likewise stomached for certaine follies, presently departed awaie to the king of France, &c. now the king committed his said brother Odo to prison, where he remained about the space of foure yeres after, to wit, to the death of king William.

King William taketh of euery hysde of land throughout England 6. shillings, An. reg. 19. and then sayled ouer into the parts beyond the Seas.

Canute king of Denmarke, with a mightie paue by the assistance of his father in lawe Robert Earle of Flanders, was ready to haue come into England, whereupon king William byping Soulesours out of all fraunce, manie thousandes of footemen and archers, and taking some south of Normandie, in the harvest time returned into England, and denided his Soulesours throughout the Realme, charging the Bishoppes, Abbots, Carles, Barons, Sheriffes, and prepositiours to find them meat and drinke, but after, when he was deridde that his enemies were hanged, and let of their purpose, hee sent backe part of his armie, part he kept with him all winter, and in the seass of the Nativitie he helde his Court at Gloucestre, where unto thre of his Chaplaines hee gave thre Bishoppiches, to Maurice the Bishoppiche of London, to William that of Thetforde, and to Robert the Bishoppiche of Chester.

King William caused all England to bee described, to understand what land everie of his Barons did possesse, how manie knightes fees, how many plough landes, howe manie villans, how many beastes, or cattell, yea how much readie money everie man possessed within his kingdome, from the greatestt to the least, and howe much rent everie mans possession might yeelde, thus the land was replete with manie mischiefes, that came of this doing.

In the Whitson weeke king William honoured his sonne Henry at Westmister, where he then held his Court, with the order of knighthood, which order of knighthood, how the same was ministred I read not, but as Willelmus Ingulphus, In time of the Saxons before the conquest of the Normanes, The English mens custome was, that he that should be consecrated to lawfull warfare, should the evening going before the daie of his consecration, to some Bishoppe, Abbot, Monke, or Priest, contrite and compunct, make confession of his sinnes, and absolued, should continue all night in the Church, and give him selfe to praers, deuotions, and afflictions: And on the morrowe hearing the deuine seruice, should haue a sword put about his necke, and communicating at the same seruice the holie mysteries of Christ, should thenceforth continue a lawfull knight, which custome of consecrating a knight the Normans despised.

Shortly after king William commanded that Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Carles, Barons, Vicounts, with their power of men of armes should meete him on the first daie of September, at Salisbury, whither when they were come, hee caused the men of armes to sweare to him fealtie against all men.

The same yere Clito Edgar with licence obtained of the king passed the sea with 200. men of armes, and went into Apulia, whose sister Christine entred into the Monasterie of Rumsey and was made a Nunne.

R. Windover.

When the Normans had accomplished the will and pleasure of their Lord vpon the Englishmen, & that there was scantly any noble man left of the English nation to beare any rule ouer them, but was come to passe y it was a reproch to be called an Englishman: There sprang vp wicked tolls, & customs, & the more people spake of equitie, the more wrong was done. Those that were appointed Iusticers were the authoers of all vnrighteousnesse, who so ever did take a Were or a Goate had his eyes put out, and no man durst speake against it, so: the cruell king loued wild brasses, as though he had bene father of them, and by wicked counsell he brought to passe, that where men were wont to inhabite in townes and villages, and where God was wont to be honoured, there all kinde of wilde beastes did sport themselves, so that men saide for certaine, that for the space of more then xxx. miles, god profitable cozne ground was turned turned into a chase for wild beasts: this was called the new Forrest in Hampshire, wherein be 9. walks, 9. keepers, 2. rangers, a bow bearer, and the Earle of Arundale is lord Warden by inheritance. In building of Castles this king excelled all his predecessors. Normandy came to him by inheritance, Genemania he got by force of armes, he made Armonica or Britain obedient unto him, in England he reigned alone, Scotland and Wales he subdued, he loud peace so well, that a young warch might without daunger carrie a burden of golde through all places of England safe.

gate, and consumed to the East gate. Maurice then Bishop of London, afterward began the foundation of the new Church of S. Paul, a worke that men of that time indged would neuer haue bene finished, it was to them so wonderfull, king William gaue toward the building of the East end of this church, the choice stones of his Castle, standing nere to the banke of the riuer of Thamis, at the West ende of the Citty; he also gaue to God and Saint Paul, and to Maurice the Bishop and his successors the Castle of Stotford with all the appurtenances, namely the lande which Will. Diacon, and Radulph his brother, held of him, that they maie possesse it for euer.

After Maurice, Richard his successor did also wonderfully increase the same Church, purchasing of his owne cost the large streets about it, where were wont to dwell manie lay people, which ground hee began to compasse about with a strong wall of stone and gates.

King Henry the first gaue to the saide Richard Bpsh of London so much of the mote or wall of the Castle on the Thamis side, to the South, as should bee needefull to make the saide wall of the Church, and so much as should suffice to make a way without the wall on the North side, &c. It should seeme that this Richard inclosed but two sides of the saide Church, or Cemiterie of Saint Paul, to wit, the South and the North sides, for king Edward the second graunted that the Churchyard should be inclosed with a wall, for the murders, and robberies that were committed there. And when the Citizens of London claimed the East part of the Churchyard to be the place of their assembly to the folkemote, and that the great steeple at that time there situate, was to that vse, that all the inhabitants of the City might heare. They claimed also the West side, that they might assemble themselves together with the Lozde of Baynards Castle, for vniuers of their Armour in defence of the Citty. This matter was in the Towre of London referred to Heruins de Stanton and his fellowe Justices Itenerantes, but I finde not the iudgement of that controuersie, wherefore it is like the Church preuailed, for the wall even to this time continueth, although now on both sides hidden with dwelling houses.

of great length.

This yere in a prouince of Wales called Rose, was found the Sepulchre of Wawyn or Gawen, upon the sea shore, hee was sisters sonne to Arthur the great king of the Brytains, being as is affirmed by many of the length of xliiii. foote, he reigned in the partes of Brytaine, which to this day (saith Windouer) is called Walwyth, a most famous man in war, and in all manner of ciuillitie, as in the ades of the Brytaines is declared.

The Bpsh of Stigand of Chichester, Scoland Abbot of S. Augustines at Canturburie, Alsius Abbot of Bath, and Thurstan Abbot of Wyssor, deceased.

This yere king William remaining in Normandy, being at variance with Philip king of France, continued there a long while, whose patience the saide Philip did (as men saide) abuse, with these or like wordes.

The king of England lieth at Noanc, and keepeth his chamber as women doe when they be deliuered of childe, and nourisheth his fatte belly, with which talke king William being offended, saide, when after my chilobirth I goe to Church,

Church, I will offer a thousand candles with him, swearing by Gods resurrection and his brightnes, &c.

King William
or the King William
was in France.

About the latter end of August, king William in a great displeasure entered France, where he wasted and spoiled all as he passed.

Last of all he slered the city of Speure, & burnt it with our Lady Church, and two Anchors that were inclosed there, who perswaded themselves they ought not to forsake their house and came in such extremitie, whereat the king rejoycing, cheered his men to feed the fire, and came himselfe so nere, that with the heate of his harnesse he got a disease, and to the increase of his sickenes (it was said) his horse leaping ouer a ditch, did burst the inner part of his bellie, with the paine whereof he was sore afflicted, and returned to Roane, where shortly after he ended his life.

fell sicke to the death.

This wise noble man feeling himselfe grievouslie diseased, deferred not to do good unto himselfe in time to come, & also to many others, wherefore he commaunded all his treasure to bee distributed vnto Churches, poore folkes, and ministers of God, and politikelie assigned howe much hee woulde giue vnto every one, and commanded the same to bee writtten out by notaries before him.

Amongst the which giftes I finde that hee gaue to the Church of Saint Stephen in Cane, and the Donks there, two manors in Dorsetshire with their appendantes, one Manor in Devonshire, one other in Essex, manie hides of land in Barkeshire, some in Dorsetshire, and a mansion house in Woodstrate of London, with manie auowsons of Churches, but speciallie to be noted, he gaue his Crowne and ornaments to the same belonging, to the saide Church, which hee before had founded, for the redeming of the which Crowne and kingly ornaments, king Henry the first, sonne to the said Conquerour, gaue to the saide Church of Saint Stephen, the manor of Widdeton in Dorsetshire. King William also sent great summes vnto the Cleargie of Speure, that thereby the Churches which he had burned, might be repaired,

List of King William to the Abbey of Cane
in Normandy.

Of keeping faith and iustice, of holding the lawe of God, and peace, of obseruing the priuiledges of the Churches and Statutes of the fathers, hee admonished all those that were present, and his sayings worthy to bee remembered, mixed sometime with teares, hee eloquentlie uttered in this sort.

Liber vite Will Conquerour.

Being laden with many and grievous sinnes (O Christ) I tremble, and being readie to be taken by and by vnto the terrible cramination of God, I am ignorant what I should do, for I haue bene brought vp in the seates of armes, even from my childhod, I am greatly polluted with effusion of much blood. I can by no meanes number the euils which I haue done, this 64. yeeres, wherein I haue liued in this troublesome life, for the which I am now constrained without stafe to render an accompt to the iust iudge.

William the Conquerour
before his death

King William
64 yeeres old.

When as my father (of his owne free will going into banishment) committed vnto me the Dukedome of Normandy, I was but a tender boie, that is to wit, of eight yeeres olde, from which time, euen vntill this present I haue alwayes sustained the weight of armour, and haue gouerned the same Duke-dome almost 56.yēeres, in great danger of enemies. Those whome I haue gouerned, haue often latbe snares for mee, and wickedly haue brought vnto me domages and great iniuries.

The Normans valiant if they be wel governed, otherwise readie to all mischiefe.

Turchetill my nourisher, and Osberne Herfastus sonne, the Dapifer or Sewer of Normandy, and Earle Gilbert the father of the Countrey with many other necessary for the common wealthe, they haue fraudulently slaine, with these things therefore I haue tried the faith of my Countrey: oftentimes in the night for feare of my kinsfolke, I haue bene secretly caried by my vnckle Gualter out of the principall chamber, and brought vnto little houses and lurking corners of poore men, lest by those traytors that sought my death I should be found: The Normans if by a good and hard gouernement they bee ruled, they are most valiant, and in doubtfull thinges inuincible, they excell all men, and for their strength, they contend to ouercome all their enemies. Wherwise they teare in pieces and consume one another, for they couet rebellions, they desire seditions, & are ready to al mischief, let them therefore be constrained with a strong censure of gouernement, and with the yble of discipline compelled to walke by the path of iustice, for if at their pleasure, without a yoke they be permitted to go, like a wilde vntamed Asse, they and their prince shall be ouerwhelmed with penurie and reprochfull confusion. And this I haue lately learned by manye trials, my neighbours and kinsmen that ought by all meanes to defend me against all moztall men, with often conspiring haue risen vp against me.

Guy Harold the duke of Burgundy his son by my aunt Adaliza rendred me enill for good, for I receiued him courtesally comming out of a strange countrey, and honoured him as a brother, and gaue vnto him Tiernoun and Briquand, not a little part of Normandie, he hath derogated much from me both in his wordes and aces, detesting and declaring me to bee a bassard, to degenerate and to be vnto this gouernement, and as an enemy hath defamed mee, what néede I say more, he hath falsified his faith vnto mee, he hath rebelled against me, and my Péeres, Ranulph of Bayon, and Haimo Teothed, and Nigel of Constantine, and many other more he hath withdrawen from me, and hath constrained them by his wicked perswasions to be persured persons with him, vnmindfull therefore of his homage and fidelitie which he ought vnto me, he is went about to take all Normandie from me.

Thus therefore being yet without a beard I was constrained to take vp armes against him, and in the plaine at Dalesbune to fight against my kinsman and owne seruant.

Then God assisting me, betwene Cane and Argfers I ouercame my enemies, who by Gods appointment being ouerthrowen, I freely possessed my fathers right.

That done I besieged a fort of Bayon, and therein included Guy soze wounded, and fled from the battell, nor I suffered him to depart with them untill I had expelled him as a common enemy out of Normandy, and obtained all his strong holds. Not long after this an other grievous aduersitie came vnto me, for my vnckles Malgerius Archbischoppe of Roane, and William his brother, to

whome I had frælie giuen Arches and the Carledome of Calegſi, condemned me as a baſtard, and called Henry the king, and Engelram Carle of Pontine againſt me. Preſently after I had heard of ſuch rumors in Conſtance I entred into the Seyne, many rumors diſſwading me, and ſent beſore me to Arches a ſelue ſouldiours which were moze ſeruenter to fight, and I folloved after not with a great army, & beſieged the ſtrong fort, but beſore I could come vnto the Countries betwæne the two Riuers, Sedan and Gerene, my ſouldiours had preuented Carle Engelram haſting to enter the Caſtle, and had ſlaine him manfully fighting, (for he was a moſt ſharpe ſouldiour) and had put to flight all his companies.

Thoſe of the Caſtle I byſeled with an harde beſieging, and forced the periured Carle to exile, neither yet permitted I him in all his life to returne to that which hee had loſt. And alſo the ſroward Prelate that was neither deuout to God, nor truſtie vnto mee, I deposed by decre of the Pope from his Byſhoppes ſeate, and placed for him Maurice the venerable Ponke, whome God gaue vnto me from the city of Florence in Italie. Henry delighted with his kingly power, & hot with warlike boldneſſe, and greatly pricked forwarde with the derogations of mine enemies oftentimes hath endeouored to treade me vnder as one vnarmed, and by many meanes to feare me, and to appoint vnto me vnlaſſfull faces. Often with a huge armie he hath entred my land, but hee neuer reioyced of the praiſe of my ſpolles, hee often entred my lands, but hee neuer merie, nor without ſhame returned home to his owne; many ſtrong men he brought hither with him, whome for that by my ſworde and my ſouldiours (two worth the griefe,) they were ſlaine, he neuer caried back againe. Heretofore king Henry ouermuch inflamed againſt mee, deuised his huge hoſt into two partes of France, that he might oppreſſe our landes with a double burſting in with violence, for hee himſelfe brought an armie of eight hundred ſotemen into Troyenne Diocelle, that they might deſtroy all euery vnto the Riuer of Some, and the other companie hee committed to Odo his brother, and to Raynold of Clarimount, and to two Conſuls Raſe of Pontdesſire, and Widon of Pontine, that by the ſhallow places, they ſhoulde ſone enter into Normandie, and inuade Drani Calcegi, and the whole Towne of Roane, and ſhould utterly deſtroye with ſword, fire, and robbing, euery to the Sea.

This therefore I vnderſtanding, on the other ſide, I went forwarde, not ſuggiſſly, againſt the kinges tentes, and repoſed my ſelfe and my ſouldiours by the ſhore of Some, and whereſoeuer hee endeouored to deſtroye my lande with weapons and ſworde, I prepared a repproch, but Robert Carle of Ankeuſe, and Roger Mortimer, with other moſt tried ſouldiours I ſent againſt Odo, and his legions, who then almoſt at Caſcus, which is called the dead Sea, they met with the Frenchmen, the companies on both partes being prouided, a terrible battell was fought, and on both partes great effuſion of bloud, for euery where there were moſt valiaunt fighters, and euery vnto death ignorant to ſie, here were the Frenchmen for deſire of gaining, there ſtrike the Normans with a ſeruant hope of eſcaping, and defending themſelues.

selues and their dwelling houses, at the last God helpeth, the Normans vanquished, and the French men fledde away. And this battaile they had beyond Some in Winter, befoze Lent, the eight yere after the battaile at Valesdonne.

Then Wido Earle of Pontine was taken, and Odo with Raynold and others that were lustie in quicknesse of fote were dyuen away, Raulphe also the Earle had likewise bene taken vnlesse Roger the Prince of my warre had supported him, for lately he had done homage vnto him.

Therefore in such necessitie he requited him with a faire competent seruice, when he protected him thre dates in his Castle, and after permitted him to go safe home to his owne, for this offence I cast Roger out of Normandie, but a little after, being reconciled vnto him, I restored him the rest of his honours, yet the Castle of Mortimere, wherein he kept mine enemy, by right, as I suppose, I toke from him, but I gaue it to William de Warren his kinsman and lawfull vassall.

Wido Earle of Bayon I held in prison so long as it pleased me, and after two yeres I receiued againe homage of him, with such honour, that from thenceforth hee should alwaies be faithfull vnto mee, and shoulde euerie yere giue vnto me Souldiers seruice, wherefoer I commanded with an hundred Souldiours.

This done I gaue him great rewardes, and so honoured, sent him away in peace. After this fight ended, by and by as I certainly had tried the rumours, I sent by Ranulph of Deen those things that had chanced on the farther side of Some vnto the king of France, which thing hee hearing, straightwaies rose vp, and with his hoise speedely fledde, and neuer after did lie one night in my land, and thus euen from my childehood with innumerable pressures on euerie side I haue bene letted, but by the grace of God, I haue bene honourably deliuered from them all.

Therefore I was made hatefull to all my neighbors, but God assisting me in whom alwaies I put my trust, I was overcome of none.

This oftentimes haue the Bytaines, and them of Angeow, and Cenomania grieuously tried.

Godfrey Martell Earle of Ansoy, and Conan Prince of the Bytaines, and Robert Frise Prince of Naterell, haue laide waite to entrap me by many subtilt inventions, but God keeping mee, they were neuer satisfied of their desire.

A Royall Diademe that neuer any of my predecessors did beare, I haue gotten, which only heauenly grace, not right of inheritance hath giuen to me. What labours, and perillous confidates I haue sustained beyond the Seas against those of Ercester, Chester, and the Northumbers, the Scottes, the Gaules, Norwegians, and Danes, and against other aduersaries that endeuoured to spoile me of the Realine of England it were hard to declare, in all which the lot of victorie hath come vnto mee: And although manly greedynesse vpon such triumphes reioycesth, yet inwardly a carefull feare pricketh and byteth mee, when I consider that in all those, cruell rashnesse hath raged.

Where-

king William
held not Eng-

of inheritance.

Wherefore I humbly beseech you, O Priests, and Ministers of Christ, that you will commend me to the almighty God, with your prayers, that hee will forgive me my sins, wherewith I am greatly pressed, and by his unspeakable mercy, will make me safe amongst his.

My treasures I command to bee given to the poore and to Churches, that those thinges that haue bene heaped up by wicked doers, maie bee disposed to holy uses of the Saints, for you do remember howe sweetely I haue loued you, and how strongly against all emulations defended you.

The Church of God, that is do wit, our mother, I neuer violated, but in euerie place where reason requested did willingly honour, I haue not solde Ecclesiasticall dignities, simonie alwaies detesting I haue reieted in election of Pastors, I euer searched out the merite of life, and his learning of wisdom, and so nere as I could committed the gouernment of the Church to the most worthy.

And this maie bee faithfully proued in Lanfranke Archbischoppe of Canterburie, this in Anselme Abbot of Becco, this in Gerebert of Fontanesh, and in Durand Trearne, and in manie other Doctors of my kingdome, whose famous praises (as I suppose) sounding in the vitermost corners of the earth may be tried.

King William
commendeth Lanfranke, Anselme, and other Doctors
his counsellors.

Such fellowes I chose to talke with, in the fellowship of these I found truth and wisdom, and therefore reioycing I wished euer to enjoy their counsels. Fine Abbeyes of Monkes, and one of Nunnes, which by my fathers were founded in Normandy, I helping by the assistance of God haue encreased, and with augmentations of many things, which I haue given them they are gloriously magnified.

Moreouer, in the time of my gouernment, seuentene Monasteries of Monkes, and sixe of holy Nunnes are builded, where great seruaice vnto God, and much almes to the poore is daily bestowed for the loue of the chiefeest king. With such camps Normandy is fenced, and in these fortres let the yonglings learne to fight against the deuill, and vices of the flesh. Of these truly either I by Gods inspiration haue bene builder and founder, or els a feruent helper, and well willing interder.

All things also which my Noble men in lands or rentes, haue given to God and his Saintes for their spirituall health in Normandie and England I haue courteously granted, and the Charters of the giftes, I haue freely confirmed with princely authoritie against all emulations and troubles.

These studies I haue followed from my first yeres, these I leaue vnto my hetres to be kept in all times. In this, my children, follow me continually, that here and for euer before God and men, you may be honoured.

This chieflly, O you (my very bowels) I warne you that you continually cleaue vnto the companie of good and wise men, and bee obedient to their gouernment in all things if you will long gloriously prosper. It is the doctrine of godly wisdom, to discern good from euill, to keepe iustice at all times, and with all force to thinne wickednesse, to saue and helpe the sicke and poore, to suppress and banquish the proud and vnjust, and to bidle them from troubling bling of the simple, to frequent deuoutly the holy Church, and aboue all things to leue the wooshipping of the diuinity, and to be obedient without any wearinesse day or night, in aduersitie and prosperitie vnto the law of God.

King William
of his sonne Robert.

England not
king William by inheritance
but by conquest

The Duke dome of Normandie before I fought against Harold in the bale Senlac, I granted vnto my sonne Robert, for that he is my first begotten, and hath now receiued homage almost of al the Barons of this country: the honoꝝ granted cannot be taken away again, but without doubt I know that truly it will be a miserable region that shall be subiect to his dominion or gouernment: for he is a proud and foolish knaue, and to be long punished with cruell fortune.

I doe constitute none heire of the realme of Engl and, but commend it vnto the euertlasting creatoꝝ whose I am, and in whose hands be all things, for I possessed not such an honoꝝ by right of inheritance, but by the instinct of God, and with much effusion of mans blood I toke it, and the perjured Harold being slaine, or his fauourers dyluen away, I made it subiect to my dominion.

The naturall sonnes of the Realme I hated more then right required, the Noble men and bulgare sort I cruelly vexed, manie kinidly I disherited, innumerable, especiallie in the Towne of Porke, with hunger and sword, I brought to death, for the which the Countrey men beyonde Humber toke in against mee the armie of the King of Sweueland, and slew Robert of Cumlin, with a thousand soldours within Duresme, and other of my Nobles and most approued young Schollers in diuers places. Wherefore moued with an immoderate rage, like a wood lyon, I hasted vnto the southerne English men, their houses, their coꝝne, and all their prouision and household stuffe I commaunded to be burned, and great dꝝoues of beastes, and flocks of sheepe euerie where to be killed: therefore I punished with the sword of such horrible hunger the multitude of both sex, and so manie thousandes both of yong and olde of the most beautifull Countrey (Oh woe wooꝝth the grieve) I cruelly killed. The offices therefore of this Realme, that with so manie sinnes I haue obtained, I dare not giue to anie but to God, lest after my death, they be made yet worse by my occasion. William my sonne, who alwaies from his first yēeres hath sticked vnto me, and according to his power hath willingly obetied me in all things, I wish in the Spirit of God long to liue in health, and if it be Gods will, happely to flourish in the thꝝone of the Kingdome. These and many such like wordes William spake, and an amazemente invaded the standers by, that politikely measured things to come.

Words of king
sonne Henry.

After that Henry the yonger sonne heard nothing to be giuen vnto him of the kingly treasure, lamenting with teares, he saide vnto the king: And what (father) doe you giue vnto me? To whome the king saide, Five thousand poundes of sluer out of my treasure I giue vnto thee. To this Henrie saide, What shall I doe with that treasure, if I shall not haue a dwelling place of habitation: Wherevnto his father answered, Be of a patient minde my sonne, and comfort thy selfe in God, quietlie suffer that thy elder brother goe before thee. Robert shall haue Normandie, and William England, thou in thy time shalt haue all the honour that I haue gotten, and shalt excell thy brethren in riches and power. These wordes thus spoken, the king searing left lest in such a wide Realme sodaine trouble should arise, wrote a Letter vnto Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, and being signed with his owne seale, gaue it vnto William Rufus his sonne, commanding him presently to saile ouer the Sea into England, and that done, he kissed and blessed him, and speedilie directed him to take the Crowne, who in short time came to the pozte called Whitland, and there he heard his father to be dead. Henry also hastied diligently to receiue the nominated summe of money, and to call necessary fellows, in whom he might trust.

sought to helpe themselves to his possessions.

In the meane time, the Physicians, and the kings seruantes that kept the languishing Prince and the Nobles that came to visite him, beganne to speake vnto him for the prisoners that hee kept in holde, and humbly besought him to haue compassion vpon them, and to release them. To whome hee saide, Morcare the noble English Earle I haue long kept in prison, and that vniustlie, but it was for feare, lest by him, if he were at libertie, the Realme of England should bee troubled. Roger also of Britole, for that he verie stubboznelly raged against me, and prouoked Raulph of Guadar his sisters sonne and manie others against me, I haue straitely kept in prison, and swozne, that in my life he should not come forth. So many I cast in prison deseruing it, through their owne perversitie, and sundrie others mo, for feare of sedition to come; for this is the rule of righteousness, as the diuine Law by Moses given vnto the gouernours of the world requireth, that the wicked be oppressed, lest they destroy the innocent. But now being at the point of death, as I desire to be saued, and absolved by Gods mercie from my sinnes, so I presently command all prison doores to be opened, and all prisoners except my brother, the Bishop of Bayon, to be released, and for the loue of God to be freely dismissed, that hee may haue mercie on me. Notwithstanding, I haue decreed that they depart out of prison with this condition, that first for more securitie they giue their othe to the officers of the common wealth, that they will by all meanes keepe peace in England and Normandie, and according to their power manfully resist all aduersaries of the same.

All prisoners to be released except his brother Odo.

And when Robert Earle of Mortou heard his brother to be commaunded by the kings sentence to perpetuall prison, he greatly sorrowed: for Herliwinus of Canteruill toke vnto hisse Herlewine duke Roberts concubine, of whom he begate two sonnes, Odo and Robert. And Duke William, who afterwards was king, enriched his father in late with manie great honours in Normandie and England, and set vp with great possessions his sonnes, Ranulph whom he had gotten of an other wife, and Odo and Robert, his brothers by the mother: for after that hee had for small offences expelled out of Normandie William surnamed Werelenge Earle of Mortou, sonne vnto Earle Megenis, hee gaue the Earledome of Mortou vnto his brother Robert Herliwinus sonne.

Herlem Duke
Roberts con-
cubine.

Hugh also Bpshope of Bayon sonne of Ralfe Consule, being dead, hee granted the foresaid Prelates dignity to his brother Odo, whom afterwards in England he made ruler of the Earledome of Kent. To conclude, him, for his excessiuenesse (as before is plainly related) king William toke in the

King William
of Odo Bysshop
of Bayon.

He of Might, and kept foure yeres in prison, neyther yet at his death for his insolencie woulde release him. Therefore the foresaide Carle of Portom greatly sorrowed, and for his brother both by himselfe, and by his friends humble intreated, and with praiers wearied the languishing king. And then manie had earnestlie desired him for the Bysshop of Bayon, the king wearied with the requestes of so many, said: I maruell that prudentlie you shew not, whom, or what a man he is, for whom you intreate: do you not aske for such a man, as latelie hath bene in appearance, a contemner of religion, and a crafty stirrer of sedition: haue not I corrected him now these foure yeres? a Bysshoppe, who ought to haue bene a most iust gouernour of the Englishmen, and was in dede the worst oppressor of the people, a Donke, and a destroyer of Abbeies. In deliuering a seditious person, you doe euill, and desire a great herte vnto your selfe, it is plainly sene, that my brother Odo is light, and ambitious, following the desires of the flesh, and vnumerable cruelties, and he will neuer bee brought from badworke, and hurtfull vanities. And this I haue in manie thinges tryed, therefore I haue imprisoned, not a Bysshoppe, but a tyrant, and without doubt the destruction of manie thousandes. These thinges I speake, not of hate as an enemie, but as a father of the Countrey, I prouide for the Christian people, for if he behaued himselfe chastlie and modestlie as of very right becommeth a Priest and Minister of God, a greater ioie woulde bee at my heart then I can declare. Cuerte one promising the amendment of the Bysshop. The king said againe, Will I, nill I, your petition must be graunted, for that I being dead, sodainelie a vehement mutation shall bee of all thinges. Against my will I graunt, that my Brother bee deliuered out of prison: but knowe you, that by him death, or a great impediment shall bee brought to manie. From Baldricke also the sonne of Nicholas, for that he foolishly leste my seruice, and without my licence went into Spayne, I toke all his landes for a punishment; but now, for the loue of God, I restore them to him agayne. A better young Souldiour in armes then hee is, I suppose is not to be founde, but hee is prodigall and light, and wandereth to dyuers places.

Thus King William, although greued with ouermuch paines of the inward partes of his bodie, yet effectually enioyed his wit and liuelie speech, and vnto all demanders gaue prompt and profitable counsell of matters of the realme.

The sodaine
decease of king
William.

To conclude, the Ides of September on a Thursdaie, the Sunne now clearing spreading his beames throughout the round world, the king raised vp, hearde the sounde of the great bell in the Metropolitane Church, and asking wherefore it sounded, his seruantes answered, Sir, it ringeth now to prime of our blessed Ladie. Then the king with great deuotion lift vp his eyes vnto heauen, and holding abroad his handes, sayde: I commend my selfe to our blessed Ladie Mary mother of God, that shee by her holie praiers maie reconcile mee to her most deare sonne our Lord Iesus Christ. And these words spoken, hee presently yeldd by the ghost, on the ninth day of September, when he had reigned twentie yeres, eight monethes, and sixtene daies, at the age of threescore thys score and foure yeres. The chiefe Jhyptions, and others that were present with them that had kept the king all the night without groaning or calling, now seeing him vpon a sodaine to haue presentlie departed, were greatly astonished, and made almost madde. Furthermore, the richer sort of them straght, taking their Horses, departed a waie, and hasted home to defend their owne. The inferiour sorte, or clientes also, seeing their Maister in such sort to haue departed, snatched a waie the armour, bestell, apparrell, linnen, and all the kinges household stuffe, leauing the kings dead bodie almost bare in the stowe of his house, fledde a waie. Beholde, I praye you, what wooldie fidelitie is, euerie one as a kite snatched what hee coulde of his stuffe, and presentlie fledde a waie with their praye. Impietie therefore (Iustice falling downe) impudentlie commeth forth, and exerciseth rauenous pillage vpon the reuenger of rauenous pillers.

The amasidnes of the beholders of the kinges death, and thei flying.

The kinges dead body spoiled and forsaken.

The same of the kinges death steepe abroad, with swift wings, and wyde and broad brought soie or feare to the heartes of the hearers. For the death of king William the vrie selfe same daie that hee died at Roane, was vnto his kinned in Rome, and Calabria also shewed, as after wards by them in forman die it was trucly related. Trucly the euill spirite greatlie reioiced, when hee sawe the seruants that vehemently gaped to snatch and take away al by death of the Iudge to be free. O wooldy pompe! how contemptible art thou, because thou art euer vaine and slippery? Rightly thou maist be compared to a bubble in the water, that in a moment so proude selfe by thy selfe, and sodainlie thou shalt be brought into nothing. Behold the mightie prince vpon whome aboute a hundred thousande Souldiours willinglie waited, and whome manie Countries with trembling feared, now is in his owne house by his owne seruantes shamefullie spoiled, and from the prime, vnto the thirde houre left vpon the bare ground. For the citizens of Roane hearing of the death of the prince were greatlie feared, and almost all like drunken men, were so troubled, as if they had seene a multitude of enemies to be nere vnto the Citie, euerie one departed from the place where hee was, and asked counsaile of his wife, or his companions that hee mette, what were best to doe. Euerie one either carryed or decreede to carrie their goods from one place to another, and with feare hid them, lest they shoulde bee founde. At the last, the religious men, Priestes, and Monkes, gathering their powers and senses together, or dayned a procession, and decentlie went forward vnto Saint Gervasius Church: and according vnto the custome of holy christians commended the soule of the king to God.

Same of the kinges death suddenly spread.

Example of wooldy pompe.

Then William the Archbysshop commanded that his body shoulde bee carryed to Cane, and there in the Church of Saint Stephen the first Martyr, which hee had builded shoulde bee buried. But his brethren and kinsmen were now gone from him, and all his seruants had wickedly left him as a barbarous person, wherefore there was not one of the kinges knights to be found that would take care for the requies of his bodie.

Then Harluinus a certayne countrey knight, being pricked with his owne god nature, manfullie, for the loue of God, and honour of his countrey, take vpon king William's body forsaken of all his professed friends and followers.

upon him carefullie to see the kinges funerall solemnized. Therefore the priests with ointmentes, and carriers of the dead bodie, and a Waggon hee hyed at his owne proper costes, they carried the dead bodie of the king to the hauens of Sone, and putting it in a Shippe, by Sea and drye lande, brought it vnto Cane. Then the Lord Gislebert Abbot, with the couent of Monkes reuerentlie came forth to mete the corpes: to whome, weeping, and praying, cleaued the whole multitude of the Clergy and laity: but presentlie peruerse for tune powred out vpon al together a great terrour, for straightwaies a terrible fire burst out of a certayne house, and cast by huge flames, and hurtfullie inuaded a great part of the towne of Cane. All the Clearkes therefore, with the laie people run to repress the fire, only the Monkes ended the office begun, and singing, brought the kinges bodie to the Abbey Church.

To conclude, to bury this great duke and father of the country were gathered together al the bishops and abbots of Normandy, of the which was William Archbysshop of Roane, and manie other Bysshops and Abbots which were long to name.

All they came together at the solempne funerall of the famous King, and buryed him in the Presbyterie betwene the quier and the Altar. The masse ended, when the Coffin was now set in the earth, but the bodie yet remained on the Baxe: The great Gislebert Bysshoppe of Ebozzen, went vp into the pulpet, and eloquentlie pronounced a long Sermon of the magnificence of the dead king that he valiantly had enlarged the bounds of Normandy, and had extolled his Countrey more then all his predecessours, peace and iustice he kept throughout all his dominions. Thieves and robbers hee manfullie chastised, with the rule of righteousnesse, and the secular Priests, Monkes, and vnarmed people hee stronglie fenced with the Sworde of vertue. The Sermon ended, and for pittie manie weeping and protesting his words to be true, he requited the people with this additiō, for that no man mortall can liue in this life without sinne, in the loue of GOD wee praye you all for the dead Prince, that you will make intercession for him vnto Almighty God, and if he haue offended anse you, charitable to forgiue him.

Then Anselme fitz Arthur rising from the companie, with an high voyce uttered such a plaint. This ground whereon you stande, was the floze of my fathers house, the which that man for whome you doe make intercession, when as yet he was Duke of Normandy, violentlie toke from my father, and all right denied, mightilie sounded this house. This ground therefore I challenge, and openlie reclaime, and in Gods behalfe I forbid that the bodie of the taker awaie by violence be couered in my earch, neither yet shall he be buried in my inheritance.

After that the Bysshops and other noble men heard this, and vnderstood by his friendes, who testified him to haue saide true, they sent for the man, and all violence set aparte, mollified him with gentle prayers, and made peace with him: for, for the place of his buriall, they presently gaue him thre score shillings, and for the rest of the ground which hee claimed, they promised him an equiualent price, and so in a small time, for the saluation of their speciall friende whome they they loued, they made an agrément, and (by the consent of Henry his sonne) 100. pound of siluer was giuen. Further, when the bodie should bee put in the tombe or coffin, and was violently pressed, that the same, through the folle of the rough masons, was shorte, and streight, his fat belly (not botwelled) cracked, and an intollerable stinke filled the standers about, and the rest of the communalitie, so that the smoake of frankencense, and other gummies or spices, copiously ascending from the sensars preuailed not to exclude the worse smell: wherefore the Priests hastned to finish the burfall, and presentlie with feare to get them to their celles. And thus haue I truly shewed the fall of the Duke, and not a vaine Comedie, to make men laugh: which also sufficeth to proue, that the bodie of king William coulde not bee found vncorrupte more then foure hundred yeres after the same was buried (as some haue fabuled) neither yet his bodie to be of eight fote length: for then, such as wrote of his life, raigne, and description, would so haue noted, who all agree in one, that he was a man of meane stature, bigge bellied, &c. And last of all, for a full confuting of the saide fable, when his restlesse bones, which so hardly had obtained entombing (as ye haue heard) did afterward as vnluckely againe lose it in the yere of Christ, 1562. to wit, when Chastillon, conducting the remnant of those that escaped at the battell of Dreax, toke the Citie of Cane, certaine sauage souldiours, as well English men as others accompanied with foure Captaines, did beate downe, and bitterly desace the noble tombe and monument of that renowned Conquerour, and victorious king, pulling out all his bones, which some of them spitefullie threwe away (when they could not finde the treasure they falsely surmised had bene laide vppon there) and others, to wit the English snatches, euery one to haue some peece of them, not making anie wonder of them, as they would haue done, if the same had exceeded the length and bignesse of mens bones of latter yeres, where as in deed, there was no such thing noted in them, as I haue bene certainly informed by English men of good credite, who were present eye-witnesses at the spoile of that monument and bones, and brought some part of them into this realme. Theuic maketh mention of this matter in his vniuersall Cosmographie writing of Cane.

Now to speake of the issue of this noble Conquerour, whereof I haue before, partly touched: He had by Matild his wife daughter to Baldwine Earle of Flaunders, Robert surnamed Curthos, as some write, but as saith Cornelius Martin, and Peter Balhazar, in their booke of the Carles of Holland, Courteaise, to wit in English, short thighe, who after his father was Duke of Normandie. Richard that died young in the new forrest, as he was a hunting in the place where his father had ouerthrowne Churches, and Townes to make harbour for beastes, hee was buried at Winchester, on whose monument, hee was written Duke of Boloigne. William surnamed Le Rouse, or the Red, who succeeded in the kingdome of England. And Henry, vnto whome he gaue 5000. pound of siluer out of his treasure (as yee haue heard before.) He had daughters, Cicilie Abbess of Cane. Constance married to Allan Earle of Bytaine. Adela wife to Stephen Earle of Bloys. Margaret promised promised to Harold king of England. And Aelianor betrothed to Alfonso king of Gallia.

William the Redde fetched from Winchester the treasure, which all the pères of his fathers raigne had bene gathered, and gaue the golde to the Monasteries, and to the parish Churches, euerie one five shillings of siluer, and to euery borough towne he gaue an hundred pounds to bee dealt to the poore. He also adorne a memorisall of his father with a great heape of siluer, and golde, and pretious bones.

Anno reg. 1.

William le Rouse or Redde the third sonne of William Conquerour, beganne his raigne the ninth daie of September, in the pèere of our Lozde 1087. and was crowned at Westminster by Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, the first daie of December. He was of person a square man, red coloured, his haire somewhat yallowe, his forehead foure square like a windolwe, his eyes not one like the other, not of anie great stature, though somewhat big bellied, he was variable, inconstant, couctous and cruell, hee burdened his people with unreasonable fares, pilled the rich, and oppressed the poore, & what he thus got, he prodigally spent in great banquetting and sumptuous apparel, for he would neither eate, drinke, or weare any thing, but that it cost vnmearsurably deere. As for example it was in those daies written (and for vs now to be noted) that in a morning his Chamberlaine bringing him a new paire of hosen, hee demanding what they cost, and the chamberlaine answering three shillings, the king being wroth, said, Away beggar that thou art. are those meēt hose for a king to weare, bring me a paire of a marke, or thou shalt sore repent it; then his chamberlaine fetcht an other paire that were much worse then the first (for a better paire could not be got) and said they cost a marke, wherewith h. William was well pleased. Thus farre haue I noted the saying of h. William, because it importeth the simplicitie of apparel in those daies used, so farre different from the exesse of this present time.

Odo bishop of Bayon, and Earle of Kent, with his brother Robert Earle of Mortaigne and Hereford, and almost all the nobles of England, raised war against king William, and would haue had Robert his eldest brother to be king: but king William by faire words pacifying some of the principall conspiratores, besieged the residue in the Castle of Rochester (which Odo Earle of Kent had lately repayed) and with much labour lastly overcame them.

Lanfranke archbishop of Canterbury deceased. He renewed the great church of Canterbury, restoring xrb. manours to the same. He repaired the walls of that Citie, builded two Hospitals, the one of Saint Iohn, the other at Warbal-downe. He restored the church of Rochester from foure secular Clearkes, to fiftie Monkes. He alwaies attended his Booke, and travelled to correct the corruption of Writers. He was a great benefactor to the Abbey of S. Albons, giving towardes the reparations thereof 1000. markes, and also got Redborne to be restored thereunto. Moreover by his testament he gaue to that church a hundred pounds of siluer, besides ornaments.

When Lanfranke was dead, king William kept in his owne handes the Churches and Monasteries of England, after their Pastours were dead, making great spoile, and letting them out to farme to such as woulde giue most for them.

This king William, so long as Lanfranke liued, seemed to abhorre all kinde of vice, so that hee was accounted a mirrour of kings: But now when Lanfrank was dead, he first shewed himselfe for a while variable, as it were, betwixt vice and vertue, and after, to wit, toward his later daies, all inbend of vertue waxing colde, the heate of vices increased in him, he set his mind to cracing: and one Ranulph a Clarke (or Secretarie) a man of base kindred, by his faire tongue and subtill wit, being come to promotion, did picke forward his covetous heart. This Ranulph was a poller of the rich, and an undoer of the poore, a confiscator of other mens inheritances, an incivill lawyer, the king woulde ofte laugh at him, and say, he was a man alone, which could compasse his matters so well to please his Master, he being the Author: Churches were set to sale, so soone as the Incumbent was dead: for straightway this Ranulph was sent to take inventorie of all that was found, and the same to be confiscate to the kings use, and inquirie was then made for one meete to be set in the place of the Bpshop, Abbot, or other deceased, not for their worthinesse, but for their money that woulde giue most, who at the length shoulde haue that promotion naked and bare, notwithstanding they paid deare for it. There was no man rich but Collectors of money, no clerks but men of law, not of conscience, no Priests but Harpours. What crime soever any man had committed, so soone as he did appeale for the kings aduantage by accusing other, he was heard, yea the rope was taken from their neckes. The courtiers deuoured the substance of the husbandmen their tenants: When the laying out of haire, and the superfluitie of garments was found, the tenderesse of the body, and wrestling with women, nice going, with dissolute behaviour was in vze, there followed the court a number of effeminate persons, and great companies of ruffians, whereby the same court was not a place of maiesty, but a brothell house of vnlawfull things, such as ought to be abolished.

This was a token of great insolencie in the king, that when the Jewes at London came to him, and brought him presents, he encouraged them to fight against the Christians, swearing by Lukes face, that if they did ouercome, he woulde become one of their secte.

On the eleuenth day of the moneth of August, about thre of the clocke in the afternone, a great earthquake made all England afraide, with a terrible wonder, so that all buildings did (as it were) leape vpward, and immediatly set themselves in their olde place: after the which there followed great scarcity of graine, and late haruest of coyne, so that the same was scarcely inned at S. Andrewes tide.

Robert de Ollie the second, founded the Priore of Diney besides Orford.

King William being desirous to take Normandie from his eldest brother Robert, and to bring it vnder his dominion, he first bought the castle of S. Valery of one Walter, and the castle of Albemarle of Odo, and put into them men of armes to waite Normandy. Which thing being knowne to duke Robert, he sendeth messengers vnto his soueraigne Philip king of France, requirring him to come to alde him in Normandie, who indeede shortly after brought a great power, and besieged one of the forenamed Castles, wherein king William had placed a number of men of armes. Of which siege when king William vnderstode, hee sent ouer no small portion of money vnto king Philip, requirring him to withdraue his siege, who receiuing the money returned home.

of Glamorgan and Morgannoke moued out of
mens hands.

About this time, one Iustinus sonne to Gurguntus Earle of Glamorgan, and Morgannoke, refusing to obey Rhesus, sonne to Theodore Prince of South Wales, sent Aeneas sonne to Gedinorus, sometime Lord of Demetia into England, to take muster of souldiers, and there receiued a great army, vnder the conduct of one Robert Fitzhamon, and topning with other rabbles out of Went and Breccints, met with Rhesus in Blacke hill, and there slew him, and so paying the Englishmen their wages, discharged them. But they taking regard vnto the goodnesse of the soile, and the great bariance which was then amongst the Welchmen, as in foretime the Sarons had done, they turned their force of armes against those which had intertained them, and sone displaced them wholy of all the champion, and the best of the Countrey, which Robert Fitzhamon diuided amongst twelue knights which he brought with him, reseruing the better part to himselfe, who building there certaine Castles, and joining their power together, defended their farmes and Lordships which they had taken and possessed, whose heires peaceably enioy the same vnto this date: but Iustinus scarcely reserued to himselfe and his, the hillie Countrey. The names of the twelue knights were these :

- 1 William Lowdon.
- 2 Richard Granuille.
- 3 Paganus Turberuile.
- 4 Robert Saintquintine.
- 5 Richard Siward.
- 6 Gilbert Vmfreuill.
- 7 Roger Berkerowle.
- 8 Reynald Sully.
- 9 Peter Soore.
- 10 John Fleming.
- 11 Oliuer Saint Iohn.
- 12 William Easterling : now for shortnesse called Stradling.

Thus was the Lordshippe of Glamorgan and Morgannoke won out of the Welchmens handes, which Lordshippe contained in length from Rimid bridge on the East side, to Pallekuan in the West side seauen and twentie miles. The breadth from the haue of Aberthawe on the South side,

to the confine of Brecknockshire, about Spoyleis Castle, is two and twentie miles.

In this prouince are nere vpon a river of the same name Pontfaine, that is to say, Stonebridge, sometimes called Cowbridge, Lantwid, Wenny, Dintwid, tostones, and castles, besides Caer Phil, a most ancient Castle and fortress, which by report was erected by the Romans, and Caerdd the principall town of the shire, standing vpon the river Tase, Englishmen terme it Cardif or Cardife. Also, within the body of the said Lordship were eightene Castles, five and thirtie knights fees: a halfe, that held of the same Lordship by knights seruice, besides a great number of freeholders. Also, the saide Lordship being a Lordship Marcher, or a Lordship Royall, and holden of no other Lordship, the Lordes thereof, euer since the winning of the same owing their obedience onely to the Crowne, haue vsed therein Iura regalia with the triall of all actions, as well reall as personall, and pleas of the crowne, with authoritie to pardon all offences, treason onely excepted.

Humfrey Llwyd

How to returne to king William: he in this meane time making warre against his brother Robert duke of Normandie, toke the Castles of Walerike and of Albemarle, then sending his souldiours into his brothers country, he began to spoile and robbe. But through the diligence of friends, agreement was made betwene them, vpon condition, that Robert his brother should giue vp into the kings hands, the castles that he had gotten of him, to wit, the countie of Dwe, the Abbey of Fescampe, the Abbey of S. Michaels Mount, and Herefbourgh, &c. And those Castles which were reuolted from the duke in the countie of Paine, with the Castles which stood against him in Normandie, the king should subdue them, and restore them to the duke, and all the lands in England pertaining to the Normans, which for their loyalty to the Duke they had lost, he should restore to the Normans. Also he should giue to the duke so much land in England as was couenanted betwene them. Moreover, it was agreed, that if the Duke died without issue male, the king should be his heyre: and in like case, if the king died without lawfull issue male, the Duke should be his heyre. Which couenants were confirmed by the othe of twelue Barons on the kings part, and as many on the Dukes part.

king William
inuaideh Robert his elder brother.

In the meane time Henry yonger brother to the king and Duke, with a power of men of armes entred Saint Michaels Mount, and wasted the kings landes, taking prisoners, and robbing other. Wherefore the king and Duke with an army besieged mount Saint Michael, all the Lent season, oft times fighting with their brother Henry, where they leste both men and horses, but preuailed little. The king on a time comming out of his paullion, and seeing the enemies a far off riding in a brauerie, he alone rode against them, and set vpon them, thinking that no man durst be so bolde as to withst and him: but straight way his horse was slaine vnder him, and himselfe oralone by the one fote: and when the knight that had ouerthrowne him, toke his sword in his hand to smite him, he cried out, Hold thy hand knave, I am the king of England. The whole company of men of armes knowing his voice, straight way they reuerently toke him vp from the ground, and brought him another horse:

and hee looking for no stirrope, sprang upon the horse backe, and with an angrie countenance beholding all that stood about him, said: Who was it that ouerthrowne me? And the knight which had done the dede, saide: I not thinking that you had bene the king, but a knight, did ouerthrow you. With the which answer the king being pleased, swore by Lukes face, thou shalt be my knight, and shalt bee witten in my white Booke, with the reward of a worthy knight.

homage to
king William.

Malcolme king of Scottes, with a great armie invaded Northumberland, meaning if he had sped well to proceede further, but he was disappointed in his first attempt, notwithstanding he returned with great praises. Whereof when king William vnderstoode, hee returned into England with his brother Robert, and shortly after with no small naup and army of horsemen and footmen, he went into Scotland to invade king Malcolme, but before he could come thither, almost all his naup was drowned, and many of his horsemen perished through hunger and colde. King Malcolme mette with king William, which when Duke Robert behelde, he called to him Clito Edgar, whome king William had expelled out of Normandie: vpon trust of whose helpe, he made peace betwixt the two kings, with condition, &c. Duke Robert also pacified the kings wrath against Clito Edgar.

lightning at Winchell-
combe.

On the nineteenth of October, a vehement stroke of lightning, shaking the steeple of the Abbey at Winchellcombe, made a great hole in the stone work thereof nere to the toppe, rent one of the beames in the church, and brake downe to the ground the head of the Crucifer with great violence, and brake the right legge of the same Crucifer, the Image of our Lady also, that stood by the crosse, being shaken with the blowe, fell to the ground. Also a great smoake afterwards with a maruellous filthy smell filled all the church, which continued long after: although the Monkes with holy water, and incenses, went about the houses of the Monasterie, singing Psalmes, &c.

And on the seventeenth day of Nouember, a mighty tempest of wind out of the South west, beat downe in London fire hundred and six houses, and shaken the Churches, especially the Church of Saint Mary Bowe in Cheape, where the winde brake in with such a vehement force, that two men were therewith slaine in the Church, and the roose being raised with the beames thereof were carried in the ayre a great while, and at the last fire of the saide beames were broken with their fall so fast into the ground, that there appeared of some of them the seventh, and of some the eight part, to wit, but foure foote aboue the ground: which beames or rafters were seauen and twentie or eight and twentie foote long, which was a wonderfull thing to see them so pierce the ground (not paied then with stone) and there to stand in such order, as the workemen had placed them on the Church, vntill such time as they were cut euen by the ground. The Tower of London was also broken, &c. When king William had repaired such Castles as the Scottes had impeached, and builded the newe Castle vpon Tine, hee returning south of Northumberland, came through Mercia into Worcester, and kept the Duke with him till Christmas, but he wou'de not performe any promise made with him, which the Duke taking grieuously passed out

c me a monke, and was Abbot of Saint augustines.

Annoreg. 5.

This yere deceased Wido the 42. Abbot of S. Augustines by Canterbury. After whose buriall, the monkes of S. Augustines went to king William to obtaine licence to chosse a new Abbot, which request was not onely denied them by the king, but he also charged them vpon a great paine, not to elect any, saying, that he would holde in his hands, all the spirituall livings in the whole realme, and would dispose of them at his pleasure: so the Monkes of Saint Austines returned frustrate of all hope heauily. Now it happened at the same time, there was in that Monasterie a certaine Monke, in religion young, but graue in discretion, a Norman borne, and king Williams kinsman, by name called Hugh de Floriaco. This Hugh hauing bene a valiant souldier, had long serued king William the elder, and the saide king William Rufus, as well in Normantie, as in England. Hugh, as yet by profession a souldier, on a certaine time comming to Canterbury with king William Rufus, vpon deuotion did visit S. Augustines church, where by Gods speciall grace, ranshed with the loue of God, and delighting in the chaste life of the Monkes, he would not goe out of the limits of the monastery before he had procured to be made a monke and brother of the said monastery. Which being granted, the said Hugh went into Normantie, distributed his goods vnto his kinsmen, and to the poore, because he had no wife nor childe, and returned vnto the monastery, and put on the monkish habite, and so remained a Monke. The Abbot Wido being dead (as it is said) at the last it was decreed that two circumspect Monkes, toge ther with the said Hugh, who had scarce continued one yere of probation should be sent to the king to procure his fauour by prayer or price, that he would graunt them licence to elect an Abbot. When these presented themselves vnto the kings sight, and saide his cousin, who in time before had serued him in the bannerie of a souldier, to be now cloathed in habite of a monke, he was so dismayed in minde, that gushing out with teares he said, I doe grant you this cousin of mine to be your Abbot, and at your petition I doe giue him the gouernement of the Abbey of Saint Augustine, neither do I permit you to chosse any other, whom, butt he you doe presently receiue, I will shortly burne your Abbey to ashes. Then the Monkes seeing no remedy, submitted themselves to the kings will in the premises. But the foresaid Hugh long time refused the honour, saying, that he was as well vntowthy, as insufficient, because he was a man in a manner vnlettered, and one that had verie little skill, as wel in religion, as in ecclesiasticall ordinances, but the king and the monkes forced him to accept the honour offered. neither did the king suffer him to depart from the Court before he were consecrated Abbot, which was done in the kings Chappell at Westminster, by Maurice Bishop of London. This Abbot did manie laudable actes to the great commoditie of that church. King William moued warres against the Welshmen, but preuailed not, for he lost many of his best knights, and much cattell, as well at this time, as at other.

Castle at Grantbridge builded in the time of William Conqueror.

John Bisshope of Welles a Turon bo:ne, by consent of king William for a gre at summe of money translated his bishops sea to Bathe.

This yere a noble man of the Ro:mans blond named Bicot, vicecomes of shershe, at þ request of Hugolin his wife, founded a church to the honoz of God & S. Giles, nere into the castle of Cambridge, but afterward, to wit, in an. 1102, the Chanons were remoued to Barnwell, by Paine Peuerell. The Towne of Cambridge toke name of a fair large bidge, made ouer the riuer Grant there running, and so named Grantbridge (corruptly Cambridge :) it encreased by mean of this bidge, which was the ruine of Grantcesser, sometimes a famous citie, situate little moze then a mile from Grantbridge. The Castle was builded in the first yere of William Conquerour, as maie appeare by the description in Doomes day Booke in the Erchequer, which hath thus. The borough of Grantbridge defended it selfe for one hundred in the time of Edward the 1s. In this borough haue bin, and yet are 1. wards: in the first ward are 54. mansions, of them 2. be waisted: In this first warde Alan hath 5. burgesles that pay nothing, þ earle Sporton hath 3. mansions of the land of Audichel: and there be 3. burgesles, which in the time of Edward the 1s. paid 5. shillings and 8. pence halfe peny, at this day they pay nothing: Ralfe of Bant hath 3. burgesles that pay nothing. Roger seruant to Bishop Remigius hath 3. burgesles that paie nothing, Erchingor hath 1. burges that paie nothing: this ward was accounted in the daies of King Ed. for 2. wards, but for the castle 27. houses were throtton doun. In the second ward were 48. mansions in the time of king Ed. thereof 2. be waisted, of them 13. yeld nothing, the other 32. pay all customes, Earle Allan hath of them 5. burgesles that yeld nothing, and 9. remaine in the hands of the Englishmen. In the thirde ward were 41. mansions, of them 11. be waisted, the other 30. pay all customes. In the fourth ward were 45. mansions, of them 24. be waisted, the other 21. pay all customes, In the fift ward were fiftie mansions, one of them is waisted, all the rest pay the customes. In the seuenth ward were 37. mansions, 3. of those 37. Frenchmen haue, and pay nothing. In the eight ward were 37. mansions, a Priest holdeth one & paie nothing, 3. are waisted. In the ninth ward were 32. mansions. In the tenth ward were 29. mansions, 7. of them are waisted, but yet they defend themselves. The customes payable for this towne were 7. pounds by yere. And for Landgable 7. pounds, and 2. oves and 2. pence. The burgesles in the time of king Edward lent the sheriffe their carts thise in the yere: now they are demanded nine times. They found neither boates nor wagons in the time of 1s. Edward, which they doe now by custome set vpon them. They claime of the Earle Picot a common pasture, which he hath taken from them. The same Picot hath made there thre Millles, which taketh away the pasture, and destroiethe manie houses, and one Mill of the Abbot of Ely, and an other of the Earle Allan, the Millles yelde nine poundes the yere. The same Earle Picot hath of the heriot of the Lagemans scuen poundes, and one palfrey, and one knights armor. Alurike Godricson when he was sheriffe had of one of them twenty shillings for a heriot. Thus much Doomes day for Grantbridge, thereof moze shall be said in place conuenient.

King William lying sicke at Gloucester, and thinking he should haue died, his Barons put into his head, his promise to God and the world, that he would amend his life. And forthwith he gaue vnto Anselme Abbot of Becco, the archbyschoppicke of Canterburie; and to Robert Bloet, his chancelor, the byschoppicke of Lincolne. But when the king had recovered his health, he repented him that he had not sold those byschoppicks for a great peece of money.

King William sent his brother Henry into Northumberlande with a great power, because Robert Mowbray Earle of that country refused to come to the kings court: the countrey was spoiled, the Earle was taken, and many were disherited, some had their eyes put out, &c.

King William with a power entred Wales, but not being able to follow the Welchmen among the hills, he builded two Castellles in the borders, and returned.

In a Councell holden at Salisbury, William de Owe was accused to the king of treason, who whiles hee provoked his accuser to fight with him in combat, by the kings committment his eyes were plucked out, and his stones cut off. Many innocent men were also accused, of which number was William de Aluerie, a man of goodlie personage, godfather to the king, his Auntes sonne, and his seler, yet the king commanded him to be hanged: which William making his confession to Osimond Byschoppe of Salisbury, was first whippid throughout by all the Churches of the citie, who dealing his garments to the poore, went naked to hanging, bloodying his flesh with often kneeling vpon the stones: and at the place of execution, he satisfied the Bishop and people, saying,

King William making great warres in Normandy, subdued to his dominion the city of Paris, and a great part of that prouince: but in the meane time with taxes, exactions, and tributes, he did not only poule, but shauie and slay the Englishmen.

Hugh Earle of Chester, and Hugh Earle of Shrewsburie assailed the Ile of Anglesey with an armie, and slew manie Welshmen, whome they toke in it, and some they dismembred, by cutting off their handes and stoness, and putting out their eyes: and a certaine Priest called Kenredus, a man of great yeres, of whome the Welshmen toke their counsell, for all matters that they toke in hand, they drew him out of the Church, pulled out one of his eyes, and cut out his Tongue.

The Princes of the pilgrimes with their armies toke their journey toward Jerusalem, besieged it, and toke it on the tenth of July, placing there a king, and a patriarke, and afterward fought with the Souldan of Egypt (who besieged them in Jerusalem) and overcame him.

King William being returned out of Normandie into England, kept his feast of Whitson-tide very royally at Westminster, in the new hall, which hee had lately caused there to be builded, the length thereof was 270. foot, and 74.
foot in breadth: and when he heard men say that the hall was too bigge, and too great, he answered and saide, This Hall is not bigge ynough by the one halfe, and is but a bed chamber, in comparison of that I minde to make. A diligent searcher might yet finde out the foundation of the Hall, which he had purposed to build, stretching from the River of Thames, even unto the common high way. As writeth H. Huntington, he chalenged the inuestiture of Bishops, he pillaged and shamed the people, with tribute, especially to spend about the Towre of London, and the great Hall at Westminster.

King William having transferred into his treasure three hundred pounds by yere forth of the Bishopricke of Durham, and five moneths being past of the fourth yere, from the death of William Bishop of Durham, gave the Bpshopricke to Ranulph, who for certaine excellent parts about the king was named the kings Chaplain, but some have written that he gave the king a thousand pound for that Bishopricke. This Ranulph was first familiar with Maurice bishop of London, but falling at variance, because the Deanry was taken away from him, he went to the king in hope of a higher place, in which point his hope was not deceived, for being admitted, and having a good wit and readie tongue, in short time he obtained to be preferred afore all other estates of England, who being called to be Procurator or Chancellor of the whole realme, did many times behaue himselfe so proudly, abusing his authoritie, that he little esteemed to offende many, who laboured with continuall accusations to cloud the clere minde of the king toward him, whereof when they failed with vaine labour, they imagined how to haue killed him. For which cause, one Gerald, armed with audacitie and deceit of other, taking a boate with a selve persons, met with the Chaplaine Ranulph at London, humbly requesting him that he would make speed unto his Passer Mauricius Bishop of London, lying very sicke at his house upon the river of Thames, who being almost ready to depart the world, greatly desired to speake with him. In affirming the truth whereof, he had brought a boate for him from his Passer, wherein hee might more speedily be carried.

Ranulph suspecting nothing, entred the boat with a selve of his companie, which boat Gerald with a straight course directed in the middle of the streame unto the sea: and when the Chaplaine demanded why they rowed so long, and did not turne to the shore, they sayned that the port was further off, where they should haue convenient place to land.

And being transported vnto the suspected Shippe, in the which was harboured a great number of armed men, perceiving no hope to escape, hee cast the Ring which he wore on his finger into the Sea: and his Secretarie did throwe his Seale into the midst of the fhoude, lest through those Seales the state of thinges might be disturbed by counterfeyte processes, and Writtes set forth by the deceyuing enemye. After this his men are set ouer, being first bounde with an othe, not to disclose anie thing of the stealing awaye of their Master.

Nowe the Shippe leauing the Riuer, with hoisted sailes, entred the deepe Sea, directing their course towardes the South, and Ranulph sitting in the foreparte of the Shippe. There arose a contention among the Shipmen for the manner of his death: and two are chosen forth, either to heaue him into the sea, or to knocke out his braines, who shoulde for rewarde obtaine those garments wherewith hee was clothed: of which persons, when the one woulde haue his roabe or hypermost garment, and the other woulde also possesse the same, this contention protracted time of his death. At length there sodaynelie arose a fierce winde from the South, which troubled the Sea from the verie bottome, and the Heauens were couered with darkenesse. Which tempest so tossed the Boate hither and thither, that they coulde neyther goe forwarde, nor returne backe againe to land. And when the Mast and Cables were broken, the Ship was not onelie carried on the water, but she also carried in her the water, nothing being moze certaine then death to them all, which they looked for, onelie such was the course of the Sea, that the Shippe was returning to the place from whence she came, and yet the waues beating her backe, the murderers, a new determine for the death of the chaplaine, lest he escaping shoulde reuenge such iniurie.

But one which was next to Gerald in the Shippe, abhorring this wickednes, and being nere to the Chaplaine with sorrowfull repetition sayde, But alas, Ranulph, thou shalt now be murdered, but if thou wilt pardon me this wicked conspiraite, I will stand by thee to thy defence, as a companion of thy life or death. Whereunto he (as he was alwaies bold spirited) with great noise calling vpon him, saide: What dost thou thinke Gerald? What dost thou request of vs? Thou art my man, thou owest faith to me, call backe thy mind from the wicked dede thou intendest, demaunde what thou wilt, for I am he that giue moze then thou canst demaunde. Then Gerald, not so much allured by words, as feared with the authoritie of the man, did consent, and bringing him out of the Shippe, nowe beaten to the shore, did procure him honourable furniture, at his owne house. But not trusting the former promises, he procured his owne safetie by banishment into perpetuall exile. Ranulph therefore calling knights together, is brought to London with manie armed men, and a great noise of people, to the astonishment of all men, supposing him to haue bene slaine, he as then was sodainly resumed, and set againe as executor of the kings affaires, and receiued the Bishoppicke of Durham, being consecrated in the Church of King William being a hunting in the new Forrest, word was brought him that his people were besieged in Daine: he forthwith took shipping, though he were vehemently perswaded to the contrary, for that there was at that time a great tempest: to whome he answered, he neuer heard that anie king was drowned. At this time he got more honour then euer he did in all his life, for he chased his enemies, and returned with victorie.

Moreouer, in the Towne of Finchhamsted in Barkshire, nere vnto Abindune, a spring did continuallie by the space of fiftene daies flowe plentifulle with blood (or the likenesse thereof) so that it did colour and infect the next water brooke vnto it. Of which thinges, when men tolde the king thereof, he laughed them to scozne, and gaue no credite to them, neither yet to his owne dreames, nor the visions that other men told him of.

King William on the morrowe after Lammas daie, hunting in the new Forrest of Hampshire, in a place called Chozengham, where since a Chappell was builded, sir Walter Tirell shooting at a deere, vnawares hit the king in the breast, that he fell downe stark dead, and neuer spake word. His men especially that knight got them away, but some came back again, & laid his body vpon a Colliers cart, which one selte leane beast did draw vnto the Citie of Winchester, where he was buried on the morrow after his death, at whose buriall, men could not wepe for soie.

slaynt.

This king was taken out of this world in the midst of his vnrightheousnesse, who being wicked to his owne people, and to strangers, was most wicked to himselfe. The countries about him he prouoked with wars, and England was so miserably oppressed vnder him, that it could not recouer, for he and his traine spoiled and subuerted all thinges.

He gaue vnto the Monkes called de charitate in Southwarke, the great newe Church of Saint Sauour of Bermondes-eye, which which he had caused to be builded for them, and also his manors of Bermondsey it selfe, with all the pertinances, and confirmed vnto them all whatsoeuer Alwyn Child their first founder, Robert Bysshop of Lincolne, (who also gaue to them the towne of Charleton) or other had giuen vnto them.

Henry, the yongest sonne of William Conquerour, borne in England, at a place called Selby in Lincolneshire, brother to William Rufus, and the first of that name, for his learning called Beauclerke, brought vp in the studie of the liberall artes at Cambridge, chiefly through the trauaile of Henry Newborow Earle of Marwike, (who appeased all debates of that time to the contrarie) obtained the dominion ouer this Realme of England, and began his raigne the second of August, in the yere of our Lord 1100. and was crowned at Westminster on the first day of August, by Maurice Bysshope of London, because at that time Anselme Archbishop of Canterburie, was by persecution of William Rufus exiled.

This Henry was a noble Prince, strong and mighty of body, high of stature, and amiable of countenance, blacke haired, and that somewhat long about the cheykes, faire eyes, broad breasted, well in flesh, full of merie conceits. Hee was excellent in wit, eloquent in speech, and fortunate in battaile, and for these thre hee had thre notable vices, Couetousnesse, Crueltie and Lecherie.

Hee married Mawde the daughter of Malcolme and Margaret, King and Queene of Scots, of whom he begate William and a daughter named Mawd. At the beginning of his raigne, he restored the state of the Cleargie, asswaged the grievous paiments, reduced againe Saint Edwards lawes, and amended them. He put out of his Court all nice and wanton persons.

formed.

He reformed the olde vntrue measures, and made a measure by the length of his olone arme, which was then called Vno, an Elle, and now the same is called a yard, or a mettwand, &c.

Use of fire and lights restored.

He restored to his subiects the vse of lights in the night, which lights and also fire, had been forbidden by his father to be vsed, after the ringing of a bell, at eight of the clocke at night.

Edgar king of the Scots did homage to this Henry.

History of S.
John of Hieru-salem.

This yere Iordan Briuer Baron, the sonne of Raufe, the sonne of Brian Briuer, founded the house of Saint Iohn of Hierusalem, nere vnto London, by Smithfield.

The same Jordan gave 14. acres of ground lying in the field next adjoining unto Clerkenwell, to build thereupon a house of nuns, wherein he with Muriel his wife, were both buried in the Chapter house.

Robert Shorthose Duke of Normandie, the kinges eldest brother, which was now returned from Hierusalem, made warre upon his brother Henry for the Crowne of Englant, who assembled a strong armie, and landed at Portesmouth; but by mediation a peace was made, on condition, that Henry shoulde pay 3000. marks pærelie to duke Robert: and if the one died without issue, the longer liuer should inherit. Winchester was bzent the 17. of May, and Gloucester was bzent the 20. of May.

Robert Fitzham, who came with the Conquerour out of Normandie, with Sibell his wife, sister to Robert Belasine Earle of Shrewsburie, founded anew the Church of Thenekeburie, with the offices thereto belonging, and enriched it with large possessions, and was there buried.

Robert de Belasine Earle of Shrewsburie, eldest Sonne to Roger Mountgomerie, strengthened the Towne and Castell of Shrewsburie, so did hee the Castels of Wiggenorth, Lichile, and Arundell, with victualles and armed men against king Henrie: but the king being warned thereof, he gathereth his power and besiegeth Wiggenorth, which Towne was yelded unto him. And this being knowne to them of Arundell, they forthwith submitted the miselues, with condition, that their Lord Robert de Belasine, might be permitted to passe to passe into Normandy. Also they of Shrewsbury sent the keies of their castell, and pledges of their obedience, and then Robert, with his brother Eustace and Roger of Hoptiers assured this land for ever.

This yere the Priorie and Hospitall of S. Bartholomew in Smithfield was begun to be founded by Rahere (a man of a singular and pleasant wit, & therefore of many called the kings iester and minstrel) in a place which before had bene a marshy ground, a common laittato of al ordure & filth, & the place where felons and other transgressors were executed. This Rahere joined unto him a certain old man named Alfune, that had (not long before) builded the parish church of S. Giles, nigh a gate of the city of London, then called Creple's gate: this man he bled as a counsellor & companion in his building of the Church and Hospitall, and the one of them, to wit, Rahere, became the first Prior of that priory, & the other, to wit, Alfune, became hospitaller or prior for the poore, & went himselve daillie to the Shambles, & other markets, where he begged the charitie of deuout people for their reliefe, promising to the liberrall giuers (alleaging testimonies of holy scripture) reward at the hands of God.

King Henry inuested two of his Chaplaines, Roger his chancelor, in the Bp. Shopicke of Salisburie, Roger his Larder, in the Bpshopricke of Hereford, at Westminster.

King Henry gaue the earledome of Leiceſter to Robert Bearnont earle of Arment, that came in with William Conqueror. This Robert new founded the colledge of secular Chanons in the castell of Leiceſter, before by wars defaced. first builded Baynards castell in London.

William earle of Porton was disherited of all his lands in England, and all his castels made leuell with the ground, and the countrey soe bereft with the kings eractions.

Now the flames of wars being translated into Normandie, prevailed there, being kindled by the assemblies of traitours, as with fire which catcheth in all things that is about it. Normandie is a patient sufferer of mischieses, though it be no large region: it doeth tolerate sedition verie long, and by restoring of peace ariseth into a fertile state of substance, letting out the bosomeaker into France with free passage. Contrariwise, England doth not suffer re-having confederates of his wickednes, among whom was W. Morton, the son of Robert the kings vnkle, who from his childhood euer enuied the glory of Henry, for not content with two earledomes of Porton in Normandie, & Cornwall in England, he required the earledome of Kent, which his vnkle Odo held, bringing so presumptuous, y he would say, he would not put on his vpper most garment, except he might obtain of his vnkle his desired possessions. But the k. delaying him with subtil answeres, did not onlie denie him that which he demanded, but began to challenge from him such things, as he said, he held vnlawfully: where-vpon the said William being disherited of all his landes in Englande, in a rage got him into Normandie, where besides the basine assaults he made against the kings Castels, he raged against Richard Earle of Chester, the sonne of Hugh, inuaading, taking, and spoiling such things as appertained vnto him, who was then but a child in yêres, and in the kings wardship.

King Henrie raised a great armie, and passed the Sea into Normandie, a-Bapon, with the Church of S. Mary, by the help of the President of Angcow, & many Castels more he wan, whereupon the Priories of Normandie submitted themselves vnto king Henry. The Flemings hauing a great parte of their countrey dyuoned, came vnto England, and obtained a place to inhabite in, nigh the Riuer of Twede, but afterward they were remoued thence, and sent into West Wales.

Endo Wapifer or Selwer to king Henry, founded the Monasterie of Saint John in Colchester of regular Chanons of Saint Austens rule, commonly called blache Chanons, and this house was the first that ever was erected in England of that order. King Henry hauing set things in an order in Normandie, he sailed and returned into England, that hee might increase his strength and retorne againe.

Robert duke of Normandy came to his brother at Northampton, and friendly required him to beare brotherlie loue toward him, but king Henry feeling his conscience accusing him, for obtaining the kingdome by defrauding of his elder brother, and fearing men more then God, first hee reconciled the nobles of the Realme with faire promises, thinking afterwards to make amends for his great wrongs, by founding of an Abbey, which he purposed to build.

The Duke returning into Normandy, the king followed with a great power, where betwene them were manie fore battayles fought, but at the last the valiant and most stout man Robert was taken, and William earle of Mortou, Robert de Belesme, William Crispine, & other, to the number 400. men of armes, but Robert de Belesme escaped, when hee sawe that manie of his men were taken.

An. reg. 9.

This yere the Byschop of the holy Trinity, within Aldgate of London, was founded by Matild the Quene, in the parishes of Mary Magdalene, Saint Michael, Saint Katherine, and the holy Trinitie, all which are now but one parish of Christs Church: in old time called holy Rode parish: she gave to the same Byschop the port of Aldgate, with the stocke thereto belonging, which was of her demaines, and is now called Aldgate ward.

King Henry with sundrie expeditions brought vnder him the Welshmen, and to pull downe their stoutnes, he sent al the Flemings that inhabited England thither, which Fleminges of late were come hither, when a great part of Flanders was drowned, & also in time of his father, by alliance of his mother, in so much, that though their greate multitude they seemed grieuous to the realme: wherefore he sent them al with their substance and kindred into Rose in Denbrokehire, a countrie in Wales, as into a finch, that he might cleanse the realme of such noisome people, and also suppress the wildnesse of the enimie: and not long after hee made expedition thither, compelling the Welshmen to giue him for pledges the sons of the Nobility, with some money, and much cattell, and returned.

Richard the tenth, and last Abbot of Ely deceased, and was buried among his predecessours at Ely. This Richard beeing a man of great wit, perceiving that the ancient priuiledges of his house were daily violated, by sundrie great personages, especiallie, by the Byshop of Lincoln, who challenged episcopall iurisdiction ouer the house, notwithstanding that the same was clearly exempt thereto by their auncient priuiledges, went to the king, and dealt with him in such sort, that he obtayned his regall consent, to chaunge the Abbey into a bishoppe: vnto the which place was named for the first bishop one Harueus then bishop of Bangor. And because there was yet no prouince assigned, where this new bishop should haue iurisdiction, the king sent for the Byshop of Lincoln Robert, and of him obtained, that the countrey then called Grantbydge might bee his prouince, and gaue vnto the Byshop of Lincoln the manor of Spaldwicke, in recompence of the iurisdiction which hee before had ouer the countie of Grantbydge, and so Harueus was placed in the Byshoppe.

commonly called Chancellebridge. She made the Kings high waie of grauell betwene the two bridges. Moreover, she gaue Chanons, and a Mill, commonly called Wiggon Mill to the abbesse of Barking, for the repaying of the bridges and high waie. But afterwarde, Gilbert de Mountfichet builded the Abbey of Stratford in the marishes, the Abbot wherof by giuing a piece of money, purchased to himselfe the Chanons and Mill aforesaide, and couenaunted to repaire the bridges and waie. Till at length, hee laide the charge vpon one Godfrey Prat, allowing him certaine loanes of bread daily, that he should repaire the bridges and way. Who being holpen by the aide of traauellers, did not onely performe the charge, but also was a gainer to himselfe: which thing the Abbot perceiuing, he withholdeth from him parte of the bread promised. Whereupon, Godfrey demaundeth a tole of the wayfaring men, and to them that denied, hee stopped the waie, till at the length, wearied with toyle, hee neglected his charge, whereof came the decay and ruine of the stone bridges and way.

Of which order, the first was the honourable man Hugh Paganus, and Gawfride de Saint Andemare: and there at the first, they had no certaine habitation, Baldwin king of Hierusalem graunted them a dwelling place in his pallace by the Temple, and the Chanons of the same Temple gaue them the stræte thereby to build their houses of office in, and the Patriarche, the King, the Nobles, and Prelates gaue them certaine reuenues out of their Lordships. Their first profession was for safeguarde of the Pilgrimes, to keepe the waies, against the lying in waite of thæues. About 10. yeres after, they had a rule appointed them, and a white habite by Pope Honorius, at that time, where they had bene nine in number, they began to increase into great numbers.

Afterward in time of Pope Eugenius, they had Crosses of red cloth solwed on their vppermost garments, to be knowen from others thereby: and in short time, because they had their first mansion hard by the Temple of our Lorde in Hierusalem, they were called knights of the Temple.

But William his son, somewhat more then 17. yeres of age, who through his fathers kingdomes, lacked nothing but the name of a king, commanded an other ship to be prepared for him, all the yong sons of the nobilitie flocking thither for the company of him, as their play-fare: and the sailers also tippled with too much wine, in lustines bragged that they would quicklie leaue the other behind, that went out before them. So in the darknes of the night, the youth lacking wisdome, and ouercharged with drinke, discharged the ship from the land: the sailer swift as an arrow, and cutting through the dauncing floods, by the negligence of the drunken sailers, dashed vpon a rocke about water, not far from land. The poore soules rose with great crie, bestirred them with the ironned stauces, long labouring to get the shippe from the rocke: but fortune was against them, bringing their paines to no purpose: so the side of the shippe, leaning against the rocke, cracked, and the broken Sterne hung downe: now it did cast some into the sea, and the water comming in, drowned other, when with casting out a boate, the kings sonne was taken in, and might haue bene saued by returning to land, had not his base sister the Countesse of Perche, being sling with death in the great ship, craued her brothers helpe. He moued with pittie, commanded the boate to be rowed to the shippe, that he might take in his sister, and straightwaie the Boate did sinke, being ouerladen with the great companie that leaped in, and so drowned them all, onelie one clothe escaped, which swimming all night vpon the wast, shewed all the chaunce of the tragedie in the morning. There was neuer Shippe so miserable to England, nor so famous abroad. There was drowned with William, Richard the kings other Sonne that hee begate before his kingdome, of one of his Subiectes. Richard earle of Chester, & his brother Orwele the kings sons Tutor, the Countesse of Perche, the kings daughter named Marie, and his niece the Countesse of Chester, sister to Theobald, William Bigot, Geoffrey Riddle, Walter de Curcie, Geoffrey Archdeacon of Hereford, and also manie the best knightes, and Chaplaines that were in the Court, and noble mens sonnes fit to be knights, to the number of 160. persons, they came together to shew the kings son sport, or do him ante seruice they could: but they made the miserie the more, that they could not bee easilie founde, for searchers being placed all along vpon the sea coasts, found scantlie one of them. He also built a Castle vpon a steepe hill called Dozham, vpon the riuer of Tyne, to resist the enemies. He built the Hospitall of Beper, and the bidge of Framwelgate. After the death of this Ranulph, the Bishopricke of Durham was committed to two Barons, Iohn de Maunde-vile and Geffrey Excomband the elder, to the vse and profite of the king,

King, for the space of foure yeres and eleuen moneths.

King Henry returned out of Normandie into England.

And in the first of August, the king beganne a great counsell at London, in the which counsell, by authoritie of the Pope, the feast of the Conception of our Ladie was confirmed, the which counsell of the Clergie, (throughe the simplicitie of the Archbishoppe of Canturburie) were by the king decelued, for they graunted the king to haue the execution of Justice concerning the fornicarie of Priestes, for their keeping of concubines which the Bishoppes afterwards repented too late: but they could not helpe it. For the king toke infinite summes of money of Priestes, and suffered them to doe what they would.

About this time, men forgetting their byrth, transformed themselves by the length of their heares into the habite of women kinde. One of the knightes of the Realme, a man very proude of his long heare, at the length stricken in conscience, it seemed vnto him in his sleepe, that one did choake him with the heares of his head (for all men were shauen of their faces.) Wherefore, being awakened, he caused forthwith the superfluitie of his heares to bee cut off. Which example toke place througheout all England for the time, and almost all the knightes were contented to haue their heares cut off. But one yere was scarcely past, when all that thought themselves courtiers, fell into the former vice, & so contended with women in their long heares, that when they were decayed, they knitte about their heads, certaine roles, and coverings, being ignorant, or forgetting the Apostles saying. Let it be a reproch vnto a man, if he endeouour to haue his heares grow long.

with women
in long heares.

This yere Robert de Olley and Edith his wife, founded the Priorie of Dore by Drfoze.

The seventh of May the Citie of Rochester, in presence of the king was soze defaced with fire.

King Henry gaue his daughter Matild the Emperesse, to Geoffrey Plantagenet Earle of Angeu, to be his wife.

An. reg. 31.

King Henry in the moneth of August passed the sea into Normandie, where he remained for a time.

1131

This yere King Henry returned into England. And Matild the Emperesse also, the same yere, and calling a great assembly of noble men at Portsmouth, the former othe was renewed by them that had receiued it before.

A great murraine of cattell went ouer all England, so that the like had not bene seene in many yeres.

King Henry beinge soze troubled ofte times in his sleepe, declared the same vnto Grimbalde his Philition, the effect whereof was, that some time it seemed to him, that he sawe a great multitude of husband men with their rusticall toles stande about him, threatening him, for wrongs done by him against them: Sometimes hee seemed to see his knightes and souldiours in armour, threatening him. Sometimes the Bishops, Abbots and Clergie, with their pastorall staves threatening him: Which sight so feared him in his sleepes, that oftentimes he rose naked out of his bed, toke weapon in hand, and sought to kill them, he coulde not finde. Grimbalde his Byschop being a notable wise man, expounded his dreames by true coniecture, and willed him to reforme himself with almes and p̄aier, as Nabuchodonosor did by the counsell of Daniel.

In the moneth of June, when King Henry was entred his shippe to returne into England with his traine, the sea was sore troubled, so that the shippe was in manner ouerwhelmed with the flondes, and the winde was contrarie vnto him, so that seeing death at hand, hee vowed that the tribute called Dane gilt, should not for 7. yeres be exacted. He also vowed to repent him of his forniere life, to reconcile himselfe, and euer after to obserue iustice.

The eight of October, a Comet appeared, and was seene fixe daies together.

Byschoppicke at Carlisle.
King Henrie made a Byschoppicke at Carlisle, and made Athulph, Byscop of S. Oswald his confessor bishop there, he placed there Canons regular and indowed it with manie honours.

Henry the sec-

Mawde the Emperesse did beare a son to Gessery Plantagenet, earle of Angew her husband, and named him Henry, which when the latter father knew, he called his nobles together at Orford, where he kept his feast of Easter, in his newe hall with great roialty: He there ordained, that hee and her heires should succede him in the kingdome.

Dowles burnt.
The 14. day of May, a great fire beginning at Gilberts house in West Cheape of London, consumed a great part of the same city, from thence Eastward to Aldgate, with the priory of Canons of the holy Trinite there, and many houses of office thereto belonging, and Westwarde to Ludgate, consuming the great Church of S. Paul, &c.

Hospitall of S.
Crosse.
Henry Bloyse Byschop of Winchester, new builded the hospitall of S. Crosse, nere vnto Winchester, which Hospitall had of olde time bene spoiled by the Danes.

The second daie of August there was great darkenes in England, the Sun became like the Mone in the third quarter. And the same daie manie Starres appeared.

Great Earthquake.
The 4. daie of August earlie in the morning, in manie parts of England an earthquake was felt, so that it was thought that the earth woulde haue sunke vnder the fete of men, with such a terrible sound, as was horrible to heare. The King at that time of the eclips, passed ouer the sea into Normandy: but neuer returned againe aloue into England.

An. reg. 34.
In the Moneth of Nouember, the city of Worcester as of times before was burned and sore defaced by fire.

Gessery the kings Chancellor was made Byschoppe of Durham, and Haruie the first Byschop of Ely being dead, Nigelus the kings Treasurer was made bishop there.

An. reg. 35.
Matild the Emperesse brought forth a son named Gessery. This yere, when our Lorde Iesus, who willett not the death of a sinner, had giuen vnto Duke Robert of Normandie a sufficient space of repentance, wherein to humble himselfe, that is to witte, almost 30. yeres, which time hee liued liued in blindnes of eyes, and also in strait pison in the Castle of Cardiffe, he died and was buried at Glocester.

Godfrey Bishop of Bath deceased on the 16. of August. After whom succeeded Robert a Fleming by kinde, but borne in Normantie.

King Henry remaining in Normandy, upon a day did eate Lampreies, whereof he took a surseite, and deceased the first day of December, Anno 1135. when he had reigned 35. yeeres 4. monethes: his bowels, bryaines, and eyes, were buried at Roane, the rest of his bodie was powdered with salt, and wrapped in Bulles hides, because of the stincke, which poysoned them that stode about him. The Physition which being hyred with a great rewarde to cleaue his head to take out the bryaine, with the stincke thereof died, so that he enioyed not the rewarde that was couenanted. Thus among a great manie that king Henrie slew, this Physition was the last.

King Henry was buried at Reading, which he had founded. He also founded the Priorie of Dunstable, hee conuered a rich Colledge of Prebends in the Towne of Cirencester, into an Abbey of Chanons regular: hee also builded there an Hospitall of Saint Iohn: and new builded the Castle of Windsor: upon the hill, with a Colledge there, one mile from the old towne of Windlesore. King Edward the third builded much of this Castle, encreased the number of Chanons in the Colledge, adding to the 8. Chanons, a Deane, and 15. Chanons more, and foure and twentie poore impotent knightes, and other Ministers, as appeareth by his Charter dated the two and twentieth of his reigne, hee founded there the order of the Carter. King Edward the fourth took from the Colledges of Eton, and Cambridge founded by king Henry the first, almost a thousand pound by yere, and gaue to Windlesore. He also builded the faire newe church now used, saue onely the toppe and rooſing, which was since finished by the Lord Reinold Bray, and other knightes of the Carter. In place of the olde Colledge church, king Henry the seventh builded a Chappell, where he meant to haue bene buried: but altering his minde, lest the same vnfiniſhed, and builded his Chappell at Westminster, he made the faire causeway betwene Windlesore and London. King Henry the eight made the outer gate-house, which is called the Erchequer of the Honour, where hath bene, and yet continueth a moneth court, kept by the Clarke of the Honour and Castle, for the pleas of the forrest and honors. In which, amongst other thinges, is to be seene the yereley account, of the charges, of the planting of the Vines, that in the time of king Richard the second grewe in great plenty within the litle parke, as also of the making of the wine it selfe, whereof some part was spent in the kings house, and some parte solde to his profite, the tythes whereof were payde to the Abbot of Maltham, then parson both of the olde and new Windlesore.

King Edward the first beganne to bring water to the Castle: Quene Marie brought it thither in conduits, the house was before serued by welles: shee also for her parte, added the lodgings for the almes knightes, and placed there to the number of twelue, for there had not bene anle of manie yeres before, to wit, in the memoire of men then liuing, whereby it was supposed, neuer a ny to haue béene there. But true it is, I haue read in the Tower of London, a patent, graunted by Edward the fourth, in the two and twentieth yéere of his raigne, to one Thomas Crabbe Esquire, to be admitted one of the almes knights at Windlesoze. Quéene Elizabeth hath also much enlarged with buildings the saide Castle. All which, whether you regarde the wholesomenesse of the ayre, and beantie of the soyle, or the beauty, strength, and situation of the place, or the pleasant pastime arising out of the Forrest, chase, and fourteténe parkes that wayte vpon it, or the good neighbourhode of the rich Riuer of Thames that runneth by it, I haue thought it good to set downe thus much.

This Henry the first also builded the manor of Woodstocke, with the parke, which he walled with stone seven miles compasse, destroying for the same, diuers villages, churches, and chappels. This is the first parke that euer was in England; he placed there, besides great store of beere, diuers strange beastes to be kept and nourished, such as were brought or sent to him from farre countries, as Lyons, Leopards, Linces, Porpentines, &c. By his example, Henry Earle of Warwicke, made his parke of Madgenoke, nere vnto Warwicke, since called the old parke. He had issue by Matild his first wife, a sonne named William, that was drowned in the Sea, and a daughter named Matild, whome with her sonne he appointed to inherite the Crowne and Realine. He had also issue by his concubines, a sonne named Richard, and a daughter named Mary, which were both drowned with their brother William, Robert sūz Roy, whome he made Earle of Gloucester, Reginald afterward made Earle of Cornewall, in the first yéere of the raigne of king Stephen, a daughter married to Alexander king of Scots, and other.

Stephen Earle of Poxtun, and of Boloigne, sonne to the Earle of Bloys, and Adela, William Conquerours daughter, and nephew to king Henry the first, claymed the kingdome in the month of December, Anno 1135.

He comming into England, was repulled by them of Doner, shut out by them of Canterbury, but receiued of the Londoners, and pæres of the land, admitted king, and crowned at Westminster on S. Stephens day, by William Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry by Bishop of Winchester, and Roger bishop of Salisburie.

This was a noble man and hardy, of passing comely fauour and personage, he excelled in martiall pollicie, gentlenesse and liberality toward all men, especially in the beginning: and although he had continuall war, yet did he neuer burden his commons with exactions: but vniuersally, and contrarie to his othe made to Mawde the Empresse, daughter to king Henry, he took on him the crowne of England.

A fire

A fire kindled in the house of one Ailward nere unto London stone, consumed Eastward to Aldgate, and Westward to S. Erkenwalds chyrche in Pauls church. The Annales of Bermondsey, say, that London brydge was also at that time burned: which might well be, for then, and long before, there was a brydge of timber, as before I haue touched. And farther, to confirme the same, I finde in the Annales of Bermondsey, that in anno Christi 1122. the 22. yere of king Henry the first Thomas Arderne gave to the Monks of Bermondsey the church of S. George in Southwarke, &c. with five shillings rent by the yere out of the land of London brydge.

Flemings entred into Denonshire, and besieged the Castle of Excester a long time, which Baldwine de Reduers held against them, but at length when they within the Castle wanted necessary things to live by, they compounded.

Baldwine with his wife and children are disherited and expelled the land. From hence king Stephen went to the Ile of Wight, and took it from the said Baldwine de Reduers.

A battell was fought at Coher, betwixt Normans and Welchmen, where a hundred and sixtene persons on both sides were slaine, whose bodies lay in the fieldes, and were horribly torne and deuoured of wolues.

After this were made great eruptions by the Welchmen, who destroyed churches, towne, castles, corne, cattell, slew men, women, and children, rich and poore, or sold them in foraine countreies.

In October a sore battell was fought at Cardigan, in the which, such slaughter of men was made, (that the men except which were ledde awaie captiue,) were of women taken and led away, that there remained to the tenth a thousand, their husbandes with their small children partly drowned, partly bent, partly slaine, so that the brydge being broken ouer the riuer of Tinde, there was a brydge made of mens bodies and horses drowned.

In March king Stephen passed the Sea to subdue Normandie, where hee took manie Cities and strong Castles, and made peace with the King of France.

The third of June Saint Andrewes in Rochester was bent, with all the Citie, and the bishops and monkes stalles in the church. And on the fourth day of June S. Peters the Archbishops See in Poike, S. Maries without the walles, and an Hospitall which the Archbishop Thurstone had builded, with 39. other Churches: also the Trinitie church in the suburbs of the same Citie, within a small time after were bent. Also S. Peters Church at Bathe, and all the Citie, the 27. day of June was bent. And the same moneth the Citie of Leogere was consumed with fire.

England began to fall into great troubles, which caused king Stephen to returne out of Normandy before he had finished his businesse there, so that he came ouer into England in the moneth of December.

King Stephen besieged Bedford and wonne it, then he went with a strong power into Northumberland, where he staid not long, but went to Gloucester, where the citizens receiued him with great reioycing. Miles the kings constable brought him into the kings pallace there, where all the citizens were to

to him swoyne. From whence he went to Hereford, because that he heard the Castle was holden against him: and on Whitsonday hee late crowned in the church of Hereford. When they that kept the Castle sawe the kings polwer to increase, they yielded themselves. The king toke also the Castle of Weibhelege, which Geoffrey Talbot had helde against him.

The same daie that the king departed out of Hereford, all beyond the river of Wye was bent by the said Geoffrey.

The king returned to Oxford, where he toke Roger the bishop of Sarum, with the bishop of Lincoln, and his sonne Roger: the bishop of Ely escaping, went to the castle of Eves, and kept it against the king: but at length it was deliuered.

The same time Robert Earle of Gloucester renounced his allegiance to king Stephen, fortified Bissowe, and other castles. Also Miles the kings constable revolted.

Wherefore the king besieged the castle of Bissowe, but at length being wearied, he turned to other of the earles castles, and seeing his enemies still increasing, hee called out of flanders men of warre with William de Ypres their leader, whose counsell he chiefly followed.

An. reg. 4.

The same yere Roger bishop of Salisburie, a great builder of Castles and houses, departed this life. There was found in his coffers fourtie thousande markes of silver, besides much golde, and diuers iewels that came to the kings hand, so that he had gathered treasure, but wist not for whom.

Loceline a knight of Lincolnshire, hauing to his son one Gilbert, whome for some imperfection of his lims, he thought vnmete for the world, made him a Priest, gaue him a benefice in a towne of his owne in Lincolnshire called Semperingham. This man was author of a religious order, which were called Gilbertins, and began in the raigne of k. Stephen, he inclosed within one house both men and women, but severed them by such high wals, that the one neither saw, nor heard the other. This order in his life time encreased to x. houses, containing in all to the number of 700. brethren, and 1500. sisters.

Scots invaded
land.

The Nobles sent for Mawd the Emperesse, promising her the possession of the realme according to their othe made to her. In the meane time, David king of Scots, promising to recouer the crown of England for the Emperesse Mawd his niece, in most cruell wise invaded Northumberland, where, by Thurstone Archbisshop of Yorke, the Steward being set vp at Aluerton, the Scots had an ouerthrow at Tonton, more then foure miles Northwest from Aluerton, and were slaine aboue ten thousand, on the 22. day of August.

In the moneth of July Robert Earle of Gloucester returned into England with his sister the Emperesse, and a great army, which arrived at Portsmouth. The Emperesse was receiued into Arundell castle by Adelize late wife to king Henry, as then wife or concubine to William Earle of Arundel.

Earle Robert went to Wallingforde, and thence to Gloucester, and raised those countries.

Marleborow besieged by king Stephen.

The king helde his siege before Marleborough, but aduertised of the Emperesse arrival, he hastened towards Arundel, where being by faire speech pacified, he

he commanded his brother Bishop of Winchester to bring the Empresse unto Bistow, and he himselfe followed earle Robert with his armie. The Empresse staid at Bistow till October, and then went to Gloucester, her coming thither being knowne, Miles the high Constable, and many other Nobles took part with her against king Stephen.

The king besieged Wallingford castell, but profited not, and therefore raising a Towre of wood before it, stuffed it with men of war, and went to win the castell of Salisburie.

The army of earle Robert won the citie of Worcester, bent the most part of it, and laden with the spoile, departed thence.

The shiriffe of that citie, in reuenge hereof, destroyed the towne of Sudley, and with the spoile thereof returned to Worcester.

After this the king with a great armie, came from Oxford to Worcester, where he gaue the honour of high Constablershippe (being taken from Miles of Gloucester) unto William the sonne of Walter Beauchampe, shiriffe of Worcester, and then returned to Oxford, and so to Salisburie.

The king went to Reding, and after with his armie towards Else, but the Bishop fled to Gloucester, to earle Robert, and the king won the castell of Else, and spoiled Bigellus the bishop (who was fled to the Empresse) of all that to him appertained, and then returned.

Robert earle of Gloucester with a great power invaded the towne of Nottingham and spoiled it: the Townes men were taken, slaine, or bent in the Churches whereunto they fledde. One of them more rich then the others was taken and led to his owne house by his takers, to shewe them where his treasure lay: hee bringing them into a lowe Sellar, whilst they were busie to breake open lockes and coffers, hee conuied himselfe awate, and shutting the doores after him, set fire on the house: and so the theues to the number of thirtie, were bent, and by reason of this fire all the Towne was set on fire, and bent.

King Stephen besieged Lincolne against Ranulph Earle of Chester, but Robert Earle of Gloucester, came with a greater power, and rescued the same, chased the kings army, and took him prisoner on Candlemas day: first he was had to Gloucester, and after to Bistow, and there committed to prison, and put in prisons.

The Empresse reioicing at this her good hap, departed from Gloucester, and came to Cicester, with Bishops, Barons, and other in great number, from thence she went to Winchester, where met her Lords spirituall and temporall in great number, the city with the Towre and Crowne of the realme was deliuered into her hands.

The Bishop of Winchester, that was k. Stephens brother, accursed all that stood against the Empresse, and blessed those that took her part. From thence she departed to Wilton, where the archbishop of Canterbury came and saluted her. When Easter was past, she went to Reding, where she was rescued with all the honour that might be: thence she went to Oxford, where the castell was deliuered unto her by Robert de Olly: then went she to S. Albons, and was receiued with all honour. Here the citizens of London came and yelded the citie to her, whereupon she went to London, and so to Westminster, where she being receiued with procession, remained certaine daies, taking order for the state of the Realme, and there she gaue the Bishopricke of London to Robert de Sigello a Monk of Reding.

King Stephens wife, and many Peeres of the realme, made suite to the Emperesse to haue the king restored to libertie, and not to the kingdome, promising to perswade with him to become a Monk, but she would not heare. The Bishop of Winchester requested her to giue vnto Eustace his nephew, King Stephens son, his fathers Earledome, but it would not be. The citizens of London required her to restore King Edwards lawes, but she being puffed vp with pride, would not grant their request, whereupon they conspired to take her prisoner: but she aduertised hereof, fledde with shame, leaving behinde her all her furniture of household and apparell.

Henry Bishop of Winchester, casting which way to deliuer his brother, perswaded the Londoners to aide him. The Emperesse got her to Oxford, and from thence to Gloucester, and thence with her assured friend Miles again to Oxford: & because she trusted most in him, she to do him honor, gaue him the earledome of Hereford. And now hauing got a great army, about Lammas went againe to Winchester, and lodged in the Castle there. The Bishop abashed of her so daime committing, departed out at one Gate, as she came in at another. He getting a great army, with the helpe of the Londoners besieged the citie, and the second of August committed the Citie to the fire, with the which, the Punnie, and houses of office, with more then twenty churches (some wite fortie) and a great part of the city, with the monastery of S. Grimbald, and the houses thereto belonging, were brought to ashes.

About the exaltation of the Crosse, the Emperesse being wearied of long siege, got her to horsebacke with her brother Reginald earle of Cornewall, and many other. Erle Robert followed with a great number of lords and knights, but the bishops men setting on them, slew and toke a great number.

The Emperesse fled to the castle of Lutegerhall heauie and almost dead for feare: from thence she was brought to the Castle of Mies, and from thence to Gloucester, bound in a horse-litter like a dead carcasse.

Erle Robert being pursued, was taken at Stobbysdige with erle Waren, & many other, and presented to the queene, as then new entred into Winchester.

Erle Robert was deliuered to William de Ypres, who put him in prison in the castle of Rochester.

Miles erle of Hereford hardly escaped, and came to Gloucester almost naked.

The bishops men bzent the monastery of Punnies at Warwel, &c. the books and ornaments of the Punnies were taken and borne away, and men slaine euen before the Altar. These things thus done, the bishops wrath was somewhat appeased, but his couetousnesse encreased, so that being prompted thereto by the Prior of the newe monastrie in Winchester lately bzent, he toke off of the Crosse that was burnt five hundred pounds of silver, & thirtie marks in golde, thre crownes, with as manie seates of fine Arabike golde, set with precious precious stones: all this he laide vp in his owne treasure.

King Stephen and Earle Robert being straitly kept, at length through mediation of friends, a peace was concluded, that they should bee deliuered, the king to his kingdome, and the Earle to his libertie.

Geoffrey Mandeuile fortified the Tower of London: and Robert Bishop of London was taken at Fulham by Geoffrey Mandeuile.

Geoffrey bishop of Durham deceased, when he had late bishop of Durham 13 yeres: he builded the Castle of Aluerton, which he gaue to his nephew William, whom he toynd in marriage with the Earles niece of Albemarle.

The king and earle being set at libertie, did not onely reuue, but multiplie their malice: the king repayed his power and expences, the Earle went over the Sea to Geoffrey Earle of Anslow, whom he found occupied in warres against certaine of his subjects of Anslow, so that he could not come into England with him: whereupon he taking Henry, eldest sonne to Geoffrey Earle of Anslow, and Mawd the Emperesse, with certaine chosen men of armes, returned into England.

King Stephen hearing that earle Robert was gone out of the realme, and the Emperesse to lie at Oxford, with a great power came and besieged her two moneths space.

Earle Robert with Henry sonne to the Emperesse, and other his complices, landed at Warham, where he besieged the castle, which was defended by Hubert de Lucie, who at length yielded the same. In the meane time, the Emperesse seeing that she was void of all helpe, with a womanish subtilty deceiued the kings scout-watch, closhing her selfe and her company, five in number, all in white, and vpon a night went over the Thames on foote, which was then hard frozen, and white with snow: that night she went to Wallingford, and the Castle of Oxford was yielded to the king. After the winning of Warham castle, Robert went to visit his sister the Emperesse, who was not a little ioyfull to see him and her young son Henry, which Henry remained at Bristow for the space of foure yeres, and there was brought vp in learning.

King Stephen after the robbing of many churches, burning and robbing of towne and villages by the hands of the Fleming souldiers, he and his brother Henry bishop of Winchester, builded a castle of the Dunry at Wilton, to repress the incursions of them of Salisbury. Earle Robert the first of July fell suddenly vpon them in Wilton, and set the towne on fire. The king with the bishop fled with shame, the earles men toke the kings people, and sackt his plate and other things: there were taken of the kings men verie many, and among other, William Martell sewer to king Stephen, who was sent to Wallingford, there to be kept prisoner: William de S. Barbara was made bishop of Durham.

Miles earle of Hereford died and his eldest son Roger succeeded him.

William of Wyres founded Worley Abbey in Kent.

King Stephen toke Geoffrey Mandeuile Earle of Essex, at Saint Albons: which Geoffrey could not be set at libertie till hee had deliuered the Tower of London, with the Castles of Malden and Plym. When the Earle was thus

In the moneth of May, Henry the Empresse sonne, with a great companie of cholen men of armes and other came into England, vnto whome forthwith manie Castles and strong holdes were deliuered, and hee made a newe coine, which was called the Dukes coine, and not onlie he, but also all the potentates of the Realme, as well byshops, as earles and barons, had each one his owne coine: but after ward the duke did inhibit the most part of these coines. The Duke taking with him Ranulph earle of Chester, Roger earle of Hereford, and diuers other, he went to David king Scottes, of whome he was iustfullie receiued, & made knight. When king Stephen heard, that David king of Scots, with his strength, and Henry son to the Empresse with his westerne Lords, were together at Carlile, he came to Porke with a great army, for feare they shoulde attempt any thing against that Citie, and so late there the moneth of August:

King Stephen called a Parliament at London, declaring to Theobald archbishop of Canterbury, and the other bishops, howe he would utterly disherite Henry duke of Normandie, and confirme his owne sonne Eustace to be his successor by crowning him king: but the Pope had sent a commandement to the Archbishoppe, prohibiting him to crowne king Stephens sonne, because his father had usurped the kingdom, contrarie to his Othe. Which thing (as was thought) was brought to passe by the subtil policy of Thomas Becket, a Chappaine borne in London.

King Stephen and his sonne, being not a little offended the rewliss, caused the bishops with their Primate to be closed up in an house, threatening with terrores to extort of them, that which with prayers or price they could not obtaine. The Archbishop stode standing in his purpose, some of the Bishops through feare went from him, at length the archbishop by a marvellous hap escaping, got over the Thames, and so to Dover: and thence transporting over the seas, escaped the threats of the king and his son, and deprieved his sonne of his coveted honour. Archbishop

Duke Henry in the Octaues of the Epiphanie, came together with the king to Oxford, where the earles and barons by the kinges commandement swaie fealtie to duke Henry, sauing the kings honoz so long as he liued. This assurance being made, they departed asunder, but shortly after they met againe at Dunstable, there to intreat of the state and peace of the kingdom.

Shortly after duke Henry with king Stephen and certaine Lords of England came to Canterburie, and from thence to Dover, where they had communication nification with Theodrike Earle of Flanders, and the countesse the dukes Aunt. When the king and the Duke had dismissed the Earle of Flanders, and were turning towards Canterbury, the slaughter of the Duke was prepared by a conspiracie of the Flemings which enuied both the Duke and peace: but behold, sodainly the kings yonger son William priate with the conspirators, on Barham Downe fell off his horse, and breaking his legge, he gathered all the company about him in sorrow. The Duke in the meane time vnderstanding the appointed treasons got him to Canterburie, and so escaped his enemies hands: from thence by Rochester and London, he came to the sea, and passed ouer into Normandie.

Hugo de Purcaco, treasurer of Poike and Archdeacon of Winchester, was made bishop of Durham.

In October the king met the Earle of Flanders againe at Douer, and talked with him.

After the earle was dismissed, the king was taken with a sodaine paine of the flake passion, and with an olde disease of running of the Emmerodes, and there in the house of the Monkes died the five and twentieth of October, when he had reigned eightene yeres, tenne moneths, and odde daies. He founded the Abbeies of Cogshall in Essex, of Furnesse in Lancashire, and Feuersham in Kent, where his bodie was buried for the time, but since the suppression of that house, for the lead that inclosed his bodie, the same bodie was throwne into the next water. Hee founded an house for Nunnes at Carew, and an house of Nunnes at Higham, foure miles from Grauesend. ward with long siege took the Castles of Spirable, and Chiron, which Geoffrey his brother had helde, whereupon there was a peace concluded betwixt them, that the king should giue to Geoffrey, euery yere a thousand pound of English money, and two thousand pound of Angelew; and thereupon the third Castle called Rowdune was yelded to the king, and so was the disention appeased, and king Henry obtained homage, and pledges of all Aquitaine, and Gascoigne, and prepared to returne towards England.

This yere Quene Elianor brought forth a daughter named Matild. And the same yere died William the kings eldest sonne, and was buried at Reding.

King Henry coyned new money, which onely was currant in this Realme, An. reg. 5. and all other coines were forbidden.

Conon Earle of Richmond comming out of England into Bytaine, took the Citie of Redonens, expelling Eudo, which Conon afterward was receiued as Duke ouer almost all Bytaine. Nicholas Tre.

King Henry hauing overcome his brother Geoffrey returned into England, & then with an army went against the Welchmen, where he selled their woods, fortified the castle of Rudland, and recovered many strong holdes. He recified the castle of Basingworke, &c. but he lost many of his men, for Henry of Essex that bare the kings standard, as he was assailed amongst his enemies, let fall the standard to the ground, which incouraged the Welchmen in such sort, that the king being sore distressed, had much ado to saue himselfe, and was faine to flie: of whose part, Eustace fitz Iohn, and Robert Curcis, two worthy knights, with others other noble men and gentlemen were slaine. In this meane time the king, although he were much troubled with wars, yet was he not blindefull of Ireland. For directing his messengers to Rome with the letters of abuses, gotten at the councill of Cassels, he also obtained by their suite, of Pope Adrian (an Englishman by birth) a p̄uiledge, both to haue the dominion of the Irish people, with his authoritie and consent, and also to instruct them in the rudiments of faith and ecclesiasticall rites, after the order of the church of England. Which p̄uiledge, being sent over into Ireland, by Nicholas of Wallingford, then B̄ior of Elnesbury, and afterward Abbot, and also by William Fitz Adelme, Immediately there was a synode of B̄yshops assembled at Waterford, wherein it was read in publike audience, with generall consent of all, by Iohn B̄yshop of Salisbury, afterward B̄yshop of Chartres, who was sent to Rome for that purpose, and by him the foresaide Pope Adrian sent a ring of golde to the king of England in token of the inuestiture, which was incontinently laide by with the p̄uiledge in the arches of Winchester. Wherefore, I thought it not superfluous to set downe here the tenure of that p̄uiledge, but first a word or two of Pope Adrian, because I haue saide, he was an English man, his name was Nicholas Breake-speare, borne at Langley in the Countie of Hertford, sonne to Robert a younger brother of the house of Breake-speares, which Robert after the death of his wife, professed himselfe a Monk of S. Albons, leauing his son to prouide for himselfe. This young man passed into France, was thorne a Monk, and after chosen Abbot, went to Rome, was consecrated B̄yshop of Alba, made Cardinall, sent Legate to the Forwaies, where he reduced that nation from Paganisme to christianitie, and after returned to Rome, when Anastasius was dead, he was chosen Pope, by the name of Adrian the fourth, and now followeth the p̄uiledge.

Adrian B̄yshop, seruant of the seruants of God, to his dære sonne, the most excellent king of England, health and Apostolike Benediction, your highnes resolution in the laudable, and fruitfull spreading abroad your glorious name on earth, and in obtaining the reward of eternal felicitie in heauen, while you determine determine like a Catholike Prince to enlarge the boundes and limits of the church, to declare to the vblearned and rude people, the truth of the Christian faith, and to roote out of our Lordes ground the plants of wickednesse; and towards the performace thereof, you require the counsell and fauour of the Apostolike seate: In which action, with how much the more graue counsell, and deepe consideration, you doe procede, so much the more fortunate successe therein (God assisting you) we nothing doubt you shall haue, for that alwaies they are wont to attaine to a good and happy ende, which take their beginning from the zeale of faith, and loue of true religion. For Ireland, and all other Islands, to the which Christ the sonne of iustice hath giuen light, and which haue receiued the instructions of the Christian faith, there is no doubt but they doe appertaine and belong to the right of Saint Peter and the holy church of Rome, which also your excellencie acknowledgeth: wherefore how much the more plentifully we do seate in them the faithfull plant, and graffe the bud acceptable to God, so much the more doe we see that shall bee more strictly required of vs in our inward thoughts: You haue signified to vs (most deere son in Christ) that you will enter into the Ile of Ireland to subdue that people vnto lawes, and that there you will enterprize the plantes of vices, and that you will paie a pærcely pension of one penny for euerie house there to S. Peter, and that you will preserve the rightes of the churches here, whole and inuolated. And we following with a great fauour your gotly and laudable desire, doe gratefully accept, and willingly consent that you do enter into that Island to enlarge the bounds of the Church, to restraine the course of wickednes, to correct manners, to plant vertue, and augment the Christian religion, and that you doe put in execution those things that shall appertaine to the honour of God and saluation of that land, and the people there shall receiue you honourably, and as their Lord shall reuerence you, the churches right remaining sound, and no way infringed, and alwaies reseruing to S. Peter, and the holy church of Rome, the pærcely pension of euerie house there. If therefore you bring that to passe, which in your mind you haue conceiued, indeno: to informe that nation in god manners, and couet as well by your selfe as by others to instruct such as you perceiue capable in this faith, in this word, and in this life, that the church there may be adorneed, the religion of the Christian faith may be there planted, and may there rest, and that those things that pertaine to the honour of God and saluation of soules be so ordered and disposed of, that of God you may receiue the full measure of euerlasting reward, and in earth obtaine a glorious name for euer.

King Henry the father kept his Christmas at Cane in Normandy, with his three sonnes, King Henry the yonger, Richard Earle of Poitou, and Geoffrey earle of Byspaine: there was also Henry Duke of Saronie, with his wife and their children, the Archbishops of Canterbury and Bolaine, with other bishops, earles and barons in great number. Here would H. Henry the father, that his sonne Henry the young king, should have received homage of his brethren, Richard earle of Poitou, and Geoffrey earle of Byspaine, whereunto the earle of Byspaine did not stay to graunt, but the Earle of Poitou bitterly refused to doe it, saying it was not convenient so long as their father lived, to acknowledge any superiouritie to his brother: for as the fathers inheritance was due to the eldest sonne, so he had to claime the lands which belonged to his mother. This deniall much offended his brother the young king, whereupon Richard departed from the Court in great displeasure, and coming into Poitou, he began to fortifie his Castles, that he might be in a readinesse to stand at defence for his safeguard, if his father or brethren should come to pursue him. But not long after, king Henry the sonne, by counsell of his father followed him, being also encouraged thereunto by the earles and Barons of Poitou, which for the sharpe and cruell government of earle Richard hated him. And shortly after commeth their brother Geoffrey with a great armie in aide of his brother the young king, insomuch that earle Richard not knowing how to shift the present danger, sent to his father for aide. Who being sorry to see such unnaturall dealing amongst his sonnes, gathered an armie, and came forthward, and did so much, that all the three sonnes came to Angeres, and there swore to be obedient to their fathers will. The kings of England and of France, with Richard earle of Poystow, the Legate, and the archbishops of Canterbury, Roane, Rhenes, and Burges, met at Pantis the ninth day of June. There Philip the French king required, that his sister which had bene kept in England two and twentie yeres, might be restored vnto earle Richard as his wife, and earle Richard desired the same, but king Henry denied this request, and so they departed asunder, and got them to armour. The French king, and Earle Richard pursued the king of England so hart, that he was forced to yeld to al the requests, as wel of the French king, as of his sonne Richard. This was done at Gisors, and so departing came to Agai. When all matters were accorded, as is aforesaid, betwene the two kings of England and of France, the king of Englande required of the king of France to haue all the names deliuered him in writing, which had promised to take part against him, and were ioined as confederates with the king of France, and earle Richard, which request was granted, and when the roble was presented vnto him, he found his sonne Iohn the first person that was named in the register, wherewith he was so sore troubled, and disquieted in his minde, that comming to Chinon, he felt such griefe hereof, that he cursed euen the very day in which he was borne, and gaue his sonnes Gods curse and his, the which he would neuer release, although he was admonished to do it by manie Bishops, and religious persons. Whereupon being brought to such extremity as ye haue heard, he was taken with a grievous sicknesse, which bringing him to bitter desperation of returning to health, he finally departed this life on the 6 day of July, in the yere 1189. and the 61. of his age, when he had reigned 34 yeres, 7. moneths lacking 11. daies, and was buried at Founteuerard in a monasterie of Nunnes, which he had founded. He had also founded the Priories of Stanley, of S. Martin in Dover, and of Basingwarke, he made of an olde Colledge of secular Chanons, an Abbey of regular Chanons at Waltham in Essex. He builded many Castles in England, and he beganne the stone brydge over the river of Thames at London. Hee left in his treasure more then a hundred thousand markes.

He had issue by Elianor his wiue, William that died young, Henry that was crowned king, and died before his father, Richard that reigned next after him, Geoffrey Duke of Brytaine, that died before him (but left issue Arthur and Elianor) and Iohn that after the death of his brother Richard, toke on him the kingdom, disheriting his nephewes Arthur and Elianor the true heires: daughters he had Matilde, married to the Duke of Saxonie, Helene Quene of Castile, and Ioane Quene of Spaine.

This king, when he was carried forth to be buried, was first apparelled in his princely robes, hauing his crowne on his head, gloues on his hands, and shoes on his feet, wrought with golde spurs on his heeles, a ring of gold on his finger, a scepter in his hand, and a sword by his side, and so was laid covered, hauing a pleasant countenance, which when it was told to his sonne Richard, hee came with all speede, to see him, and as sone as hee came nere him, the blood gushed out of the nose of the dead corpes in great plentie, euen as if the spirite of the dead king had disdained, and abhorred the presence of him, who was thought to be the chiefe cause of his death, which thing caused the said Richard to weepe bitterly, and he caused his fathers bodie to be honourably buried at Founteuerard as is afore said.

King Richard Cueur de Lion.

An. reg. 1.

Richard the first borne at Oxford, for his balsantnes surnamed Cueur de Lion, or with the lions heart, the third son of Henry the second, began his raigne the sixth day of July, in the yere of our Lord 1189. at the age of 35. yeres.

He was bigge of stature, with a merrie countenance. To his his souldiers fauourable : bountifull to his friends : to strangers a grieuous enemy : hard to be pleased : desirous of warre : abhorring idleness.

Elianor the olde Queene, mother to Duke Richard, who at the commandment of her husband, had bene long kept in prison, was set at libertie. And then she with the Lordes of the Realme abode the kings comming at Winchester, where Geoffrey Ridle the proud Bishop of Ely fell sicke, and departed this life in estate, leauing in his coffers great treasure, to wit, 3060. markes of silver, and 205. markes in gold, which was bestowed on the new kings coronation, for the bishops soule.

Lib. III.
Bishop of Ely
deceased.

Duke Richard hauing receiued Adelisa, or Alice his wife, vpon suspicion that she had bene dishonested whiles she was in his fathers custodie, sent her home with her Dowrie, hauing concluded a marriage with Ladie Berengaria, daughter to Geruas king of Navarre, he returned into England, and landed at Southampton the twelfth of August, and on the fourteenth was receiued into Winchester, with him also came his brother Iohn, vnto whome hee gaue the Earldomes of Hereford, of Cornwall, Dorset, Summerset, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaster, with the Castles of Warleborough, and Ludgershall, with the forrest, and the appurtenances, the honors of Wallingford, Tickhill, and Epe, to the value of foure thousand markes by yere. Hee also gaue him in marriage with Isabel his second wife, daughter to Robert Earle of Gloucester, the Earldome of Gloucester, although Baldwin Archbishoppe of Canterbury forbade the marriage, because they were Cousins in the third degree of consanguinitie. To Robert earle of Leicester, he restored all his lands, which had bene taken from him. He came to London, and on the thirde of September, was crowned at Westminster, by the hands of Baldwin Archbishop of Canterburie.

John Earle
of Hereford.

He commanded that no Jewes nor women should be at his Coronation, for feare of enchantments which were wont to be practised : for breaking of which commandement, many Jewes were slain the same day. For the Jewes dwelling about London, and other partes of the Realme, being there assembled, meaning to honour the same Coronation with their presence, and to present to the king some honorable gifte, one of them was stricken by a Christian, who alleadged the kings commandement to keepe them backe, which some of the vnruely people perceiving, supposing it had bene the kings commandement, fell vpon the Jewes with staves, bats, and stones, beate them to their houses, and after assailing their houses, set them on fire, and burnt them in their houses, or slew them at their comming out.

The Archbishoppe of Canterburie being sore offended with Earle Iohn the kings brother, for taking to wife Isabel Countesse of Gloucester, his cousin in the thirde degree, wrote a threatening letter to the same Iohn, commaunding him not to touch the virgine, and to appeare at a peremptorie day before him to answer the matter. The 15. of December at Wipwell, in presence of the king, the Archbishop and prelates were elected, Geoffrey de Lucy to the see of Winchester, Richard Archdeacon of Ely, the kings treasurer, to the see of London, Hubert Walter to Salisbury, William Longshampe, the kings

The saide Robert entertained an hundred tall men, and good archers, with such spoiles and thesses as he got, vpon whome foure hundred (were they neuer so strong,) durst not glue the onset. And at Porke to the number of 500. besides women and children, entred a towne of the castle, which the people assailing, the Jewes profered money to be in safety of their liues, but the Christians would not take it: whereupon their men of law said to them, it is better for vs to die for our lawe, then to fall into the hands of our enemies: and they all agreeing to that Counsell, cutte the throates of their wiues and children, and cast them ouer the walles on the Christians heads: the rest due they locked vp in the kinges lodging, and burnt both the house and themselves.

Geoffrey

Geffrey Archbifhoppe of Dorke, returning from Rome, and now consecrated, arrived at Dover with his traine, whome Mathew de Clare by the commaundement of the kinges Chanceliour, entring with violence into the Church of Saint Martins, dyew from the Altar, and so caried him to prison. William Bifhop of Ely, builded the pfter wall about the Tower of London, and caused a deepe ditch to be made about the same, thinking hee coulde have caused the river of Thamis to go round about it, but hee bestowed great cost in vaine.

King Richard subdued the Ile of Cypzus, and then toyning his power with Philip the French kinges in Asia conquered Acon, where there grew betwene the two kings a grievous displeasure: for which cause Philippe himselfe departed thence, and comming into France, invaded the Countrie of Normandie.

John brother to king Richard, tooke on him the kingdome of England in his brothers absence. He raised powers of men and with small adoe won the Castles of Nottingham and Tickhill.

Robert Earle of Leicester died in his journey to Hierusalem.

King Richard restored to the Christians the city of Joppa, and in many battels put the Turkes to great sorow.

The bones of the most famous king of Bytaine, Arthur, were founde at Glaffenburie, in a goodly olde Sepulchre, about the which stood two pillars, in which were letters written, which, by reason of the great barbarousnesse of the language, and the foulennesse, no bodie could reade: upon the sepulture was a croffe of lead, whereon was written, Here lyeth the noble king of Bytaines Arthur.

Hugh Bifhop of Lincolne, came to the Abbey of Runnes called Godstow, betwene Orford and Woodstock, and when he had entred the church to pray, he saw a tombe in the middle of the quire, covered with a pall of silke, & set about with lightes of ware. And demanding whose tombe it was, hee was answered, that it was the tombe of Rosamonde, that was sometime Leman to Henry the second of that name, king of England, who for the loue of her had done much good to that Church. Then quoth the Bifhop, take out of this place the harlot, and bury her without the Church, least Christian Religion should grow in contempt, and to the ende that through example of her, other women being made afraid, may beware, and keepe themselves from unlawfull and aduoutous company with men.

William Bifhop of Ely, did commonly ride with 500. horses, and grieved Abbeyes by meane of his lodging with them: he withstood John the Kings brother, who said, he wist not if his brother Richard were alive or not. To whome the Bifhop answered, if King Richard be yet living, it were vntruth to take from him the Crowne. If he be dead, Arthur the elder brothers sonne, must enioie the same.

Polwe Eustachius de Marke Knight, Lorde of Arceles about this time, founded thereby a Priorie in honour of God and Saint Thomas, for Chanons Regular. After which time, there were manie houses built, by meanes whereof the Towne beganne to rise, and by little and little to encrease, so that in place of Crux Roisia, it is called the Towne of Roisia, or Rospowne. Unto the which king Richard graunted a faire, and a market, with other Liberties. This Priorie was since renewed, and augmented by Radulph de Runcesser, and other: so that at the suppression, the same was valued at 80. pounds, sixtene shillings. There was an hospitall of S. Wolfangus Lazius in his booke de Romano Imperio, affirmeth that Leopold of Austria, when he had taken king Richard, for so ne iniurie done to the house of Austria, he compelled him to build the wals about Vienna, the chiefest citie of Austria, the which wals within our memory defended all Germany from the inuasion of the Turke.

The rumour being spread that R. Richard was taken as ye haue heard, forthwith with the French king and earle Iohn made a great conspiracy together, meaning to take the kingdom of England, hereupon a great number of Flemings were assembled at Witland, ready to come ouer, but their messengers being taken, their treason was betrayed.

rebelled a-

Richard.

Elianoꝝ the olde Duene caused the Sea Coastes to bee watched ouer against Flaunders, but notwithstanding Earle Iohn came secretly into Englande to raise the Welchmen and Scottes, but the king of Scottes would not aid him. The Welchmen in the partes about Kingstone and Windsoꝛe toke pꝛaies abroad.

The French king entred Normandie, founde small resistance, wan diuers townes, Gisors was deliuered to him, then he hastned towarde Roane, and besieged it, but through the great industry of Robert earle of Leicester, he profited little there, and so returned into France. Earle Iohn perceiving his treason was discovered, fortified his castles, and passed ouer into France, and joined with the French king.

King Richard sent for his mother and the archbishop of Roane to come vnto him to Almain, being now in great hope to be deliuered, & in the meane time the archbishop of Canterbury was made regent of England.

Ambassadors were sent from Philip king of France, and the like from earle Iohn to the Emperoz, offering great sums, vpon condition that king Richard might remaine still in prison, vntil the feast of S. Michael next comming, or els to deliuer him into their hands. The Emperoz shewed these letters to K. Richard, which gaue him into great dispaire of deliuerance.

The kings friends intreating for his deliuerance, his rancome was set at 100000. pound, to witte to the Emperour 100000. markes, to the Emperesse 30000. markes: and to the duke of Austrich 20000. marks: whereupon commandement was directed from the Kinges Iustices, that all Bishops, Prelates, Carles, Barons, Abbots, and Priors, should bying in the 4. part of their reuenues towarde the kings rancome, and besides this, the Cleargy brought in their golden and siluer chalices, and stored their trines, al which was coined into money.

In the meane time letters were intercepted of Earle Iohn which hee had sent into England touching treason, one Adam of Saint Edmond Clearke, being sent by earle Iohn, to psonde that his Castle might be fortified against King Richard, came to London, and dined with Hubert Archbishop of Canterburie, where he bragged of Earle Iohns prosperitie, and familiaritie with the French king, for the which being suspected, he was after dinner apprehended by the Mares of London, who toke from him his letters, and deliuered them to the Archbishops of Canterburie, who on the next morrow called a Councell of the Earles and Barons, and shewed them the letters, whereupon they all consented that Earle Iohn should bee dispossessed of all his land in England, and that his Castles should be besieged. The same day the same Archbishop and Bishops excommunicated earle Iohn and al his fauourers, which troubled the peace of the kingdome. And forthwith the Archbishop besieged the Castle of Warleborough, which belonged to Earle Iohn, and toke it. After this he besieged Pottingham Castle.

After this he called into his hanes, all such things as hee had either giuen or solde by patentees or otherwise, by which meanes he got a great summe of money.

Robert Earle of Leicester taken prisoner.

King Richard hearing that the king of France had besieged Mernais, hee toke the sea together with his mother Quene Elianor, on the tenth of Aprill, and transported ouer into Normandy, and arrived at Harflew with 100. ships fraught with men, horse, armour, &c. The king of France hearing hereof, plucked by his tents, lest the siege, and departed. King Richard herewith entering the French dominions, sent three bandes of Souldiours towarde Male Ruell, and went himselfe vnto Lochis, and besieged the Castle and wanne it: about the same time Robert Earle of Leicester issuing south of Roane in hope to worke somewhat, vnadvisedly in the landes of Hugh Gourney he fell within danger of his enemies, who toke him prisoner with oth'r of his company, king Richard wanne the strong castle of Taylebridge by surrender, hee wan by force the citie of Engolisme, and other holdes: at length a truce was taken for a time.

King Richard being in Normandie kept his Christmas at Roane, whilst both the king of Englande and Fraunce were bent to trie their malice by dint of sword, there came messengers to eche of them from the Pope, exhorting them to peace, but they preuailed not, for as soon as the truce was ended, they got them to the field, King Richard drawing toward Ilesdune, a towne in the confines of Burie, from thence he went to Bassen, and toke the Castle there, then went hee to a towne called Pouen court, this he besieged and it was yielded.

In the meane time the k. of France besieged Albramarle, whereupon R. Richard came to raise the siege, & there was a sharpe fight, but the English men wearie with trauaile of their iourney, and being rashly entred into the battel, were were not able to endure the French mens violence, and so not without great losse, were constrained to retye.

King Richard sent messengers to the Pope, complaining vpon the Duke of Austrich, for misusing of him and his, as they came by distresse of weather through his Countrey: whereupon the Pope ercommunicated the Duke, and entreated him to release the covenants that hee constrained the king to make and to send home the pledges: but the duke refused this order, contemning the Popes authoritie, who shortly after hauing broken his legge, and in extreame anguish ended his life, and was kept vnburied till his sonne had released the English pledges that lay in hostage for the money behind of Ia. Richards raunsome, and further sware to stand to the iudgement of the Church for that offence of his Father.

Thus were the pledges restored, and the residue of the money behind released, which thing to king Richard was both pleasant and profitable, for taking occasion thereof to amend his former life, into a better order, he put away his Concubines, and toke him to his wife, whom of long time he had not known. Moreover, the Emperour gaue to the Cisterian Monkes, 3000. markes of silver, parcell of king Richards raunsome to make silver censars in euery church of that order, but the Abbots refused the gift, being a portion of so vngodly and wrongfull gaine, at which thing king Richard greatly marvelled at the first, but after commended the Abbots in their doings chiefly for shewing that they were boide of the accustomed gradineesse, that men noted to haue bene in them.

Hugh Bishop of Lincolne gaue to the king a thousand markes for his mantle of Sables, which his predecessors were wont yarely to haue giuen them by the king. An. reg. 7.

Robert Earle of Leicester, offered to the king of France for his raunsome a thousand markes sterling, and to quit claime to him and his helres for ever, the right which he had to the castle of Basay, with the appurtenances, but for that they were still continued, there was no answer giuen. Starling money.

King Richard hauing refreshed his souldiours, went to Milligto, and by assault tooke it at the first brunt, and made it leuell with the ground. After this, there was a motion made for peace betwixt the two kings, being now wearied with long wars. Whereof, when Earle Iohn was aduertised, hee beganne to doubt, lest by agreement made, he might be betrayed by the king of France, vpon covenants passing betwene them, and therefore determined to commit his whole safety to his naturall brother: whereupon comming to king Richard hee besought him of pardon for his offences, and though hee had not dealt brotherly towards him, yet, that he would brotherly forgieue him his rebellious trespass. Upon whose submission, and by the intreating of Elianor his mother and other, in the ende king Richard did not onely pardon him his life, but vpon his othe, restored him to the Earldomes of Poitouaigne in Normandie, and Gloucester in England, with the honor of Eye, the Castles except, and in recompence of his other earldomes, his brother gaue him yarely 8000. pounds of Angiow money. Submission to Earle Joh.

King Richard pardoned Hugh Nouant bishop of Couentry, and restored him to his bishopricke for the summe of 5000. markes of silver; but Robert Nouant his brother, died in the kings prison at Douer.

William Fitz Osbert a citizen of London; poore in degré, euill fauoured of Chape, but yet verie eloquent, moued the common people to seke libertie and freedom, and not to be subiect to the rich and mighty, by which meanes he drew to him many great companies, and with all his power defended his poore mens cause against the rich. 52000 Londoners he allured to him to be at his deuotion and commandeiment.

The king being warned of this tumult, commanded him to cease from these attempts, but the people still followed him, as they before had done: he made to them Orations, taking for his theme this sentence, Haerietis aquas in gaudio de fontibus saluatoris, which is to say, Ye shall drawe in ioy, waters out of the welles of your Sauour. And to this he added: I am (saide he) the Sauour of poore men, y<sup>e</sup> be poore, and haue assayed long the hard hands of rich men. I cleaue y<sup>e</sup> wholesome water forth of my welles, and that with this, for the time of your visitation is come. This William was commanded to appeare before the kings counsel to answer for himselfe in such causes as should be laid against him, where he appeared, but with such a multitude of people, that the Lordes were afraid, and remitted him with pleasant wordes for the time, appointing some priuily when he was alone to apprehend him. He toke the steeple of Bolve Church in Cheape, and fortified it with munition and vidualles. The archbishop of Canterbury then being at London with other Iustices sent to him, and willed him to come forth of the church: he should haue his life saued: but hee refused to come forth, wherefore the Archbishop talking with the citizens of London called together a great number of armed men least anie surce should be made.

Ralph Higden.

The Saturday therefore being the Passion Sunday euen, the steeple and church of Bolve were assaulted, and William with his complices taken, but not without bloodshed, for he was forced by fire & smoke to forsake the church: he was brought to the Archbishop in the Towre, where he was by the Judges condemned, and by the héeles drawne from thence to a place called the Elmes, and there hanged with nine of his fellowes. Where because his fauourers came not to deliuer him, he forsoke Maries sonne (as he termed him) and called the diuell to helpe and deliuer him.

This counterfeit friend to the poore, who named himselfe to be the sauiour, perswading them against the rich, was a man of an euill life, a murderer, who slew a man with his owne hands: a fornicator, who polluted Bolve Church with his concubine: and amongst other his detestable facts, one that had falsely accused his elder brother of treason, which elder brother had in his youth brought him vp in learning, and done many things for his preferment. Yet after the death of this wicked malefactor, the simple people honored him as a Martyr, inso much that they steale away the gibbet whereon he was hanged, and pared away the earth, that was be-bledd with his blood, and kept the same as holy reliques, to heale sicke men.

King

King Richard granted licence vnto Philip his chaplaine late made Bpshop of Durham, to coine money in his Citty of Durham, which liberty none of his predecessours had enioyed of long time befoze. Robert earle of Leicester gaue Philip king of France two thousand markes of siluer, and the quite claime of his Castle of Passley, for his liberty, and to be cleane released.

Philip king of France, besieged Albemarle, and at length won it, and raised it downe to the ground, and king Richard gaue vnto him three thousand markes of siluer, for the rancome of his men of armes, and other taken in that fortesse. After this the king of France won Poncourt, and earle Iohn toke the castle of Camages.

About the same time king Richard gaue vnto his nephew Otho, the Earle, dome of Poitou. Also, as the countesse of Bytaine, the mother of Duke Arthur came into Normandie, to haue spoken with king Richard, Reinulph earle of Chester, her husband meeting her at Pontowson, toke her as prisoner, and shut her vp within his Castle of S. James de Beuinemar: and when her son Arthur could not find meanes to deliuer her out of captiuitie, hee ioined with the French king, and made great hauocke in the lands of his vncke king Richard. Whereupon the king gathered a mightie power, and invaded Bytaine, cruelly wasting that countrey.

This yere died William Earle of Salisbury, the sonne of Earle Patrike, whose daughter and heire, king Richard gaue in marriage together with the Earle dome of Salisbury vnto his base brother surnamed William Longespe.

The Welshmen brake forth and did much hurt by spoiling of the marches. The Archbishop of Canterbury calling together an army hasted thither, besieged the castle of Dolie, and toke it, and chased the enemies, established peace, and returned.

Rise ap Griffeth the Welch king departed this life: after whose departure there fell discord betwix his sonnes for the succession, till Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury went to the marches of that countrey, and made an agreement betwixt them.

King Richard and the Earle of Flanders confedered together. The French king entring vnwarily into Flanders, was intercepted and taken by the erle of Flanders, but giuing pledges vpon couenant to make peace, he was suffered to depart.

An. reg. 9.

The eight day of September they met at Lille, where, by mediation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, they toke a truce. The Archbishop of Roan returned from Rome, where he had complained on king Richard for taking from him a plot of ground, whereon he builded a strong Castle, but at the request of the archbishop of Canterbury, the king gaue him in recompence, the towne of Depe.

The Welshmen on the marches toke booties, and did much hurt, but Hubert the archbishop of Canterbury being lord chiefe Justice, lieutenant, or warden of England, found meanes to resist them, so that they being fought with, were overthowen, and 5000. of them slaine. King Richard took of every Carucate plough land, or hide of land through Englond five shillings. Commissioners were appointed in every shire, with the assistance of the Sherriffes, to see the same assessed, and rated after 100. acres of land to a hide, according to the custome. The French king was intercepted by the army of king Richard, so that with much ado he escaped into Cyprus, his army was dispersed, and almost an hundred knights taken, beside other common souldiours, without number. The Charters which the king had before made with his new seale were changed.

Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, through the procurement of the monkes of Canterburie, and by the commaundement of the Pope, brake downe even with the ground the Chappell or colledge at Lambeth which his predecessours had founded, and he had finished in the honour of Thomas Archbishop of Canterburie.

King Richard turned his army against the Barons of Poictow that rebelled against him, he set their cities and towne on fire, spoiled their country, & slew many of his aduersaries cruelly, at the last came to the dukedome of Aquitaine, and besieged the Castle of Chalme, and brought it to that, that they with in offered to yelde vppon conditions, but hee would not so receiue them, but would haue them by force: whereupon a certaine young man named Bertram de Gordon, standing on the castle wall, leuelled a quarell out of a crossbow, and smote him with a venoured dart in the left arme or shoulder: which stripe the king little regarded, but invading the castle, took it, and put the souldiours in prison. Of this wound aforesaid, he died the 6. of Aprill, in the yere of our Lord 1199. when hee had reigned 9. yeres, and 9. moneths, and was buried at Fonteueraud at his fathers seate, whom he confessed he had betrayed, his hart was buried at Roane, in testimonie of the love hee had euer borne vnto that citie, for the stedfast loyalty he had alwaies found in the citizens thereof, and his bowels at the foresaid Chalme.

King Iohn.

John Earle of Mortoun, and Lord of Ireland, aged 34. yeres, a person of an indifferent stature, but of melancholy complexion, after the decease of king Richard, took vnto him, and retained all the knights and souldiours which had serued his brother, he kept them in wages, and promised them large giftes. Whereouer, he sent Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshall, and Geoffrey fitz Peter chiefe Justice into England, to proclaim his peace to be kept amongst the rest of the Nobles of the Realme. These, when they came into England, caused all men to sweare to be true to Earle Iohn, and so went forward to Northampton, where they called together all those nobles, bles, whome they doubted, and promised in the name of Earle Iohn, that hee shoulde reſſore vnto them, and to all men, their right: and vpon that condition they gaue to him their fidelities. Also they ſent worde by Eustace de Vefcy, to William king of Scots, that earle Iohn at his returne into England ſhould content him for all his right which hee claymed in England, and therefore willed him in the meane ſeaſon to be faithfull to the ſaid Earle, and to keepe his peace, which hee promiſed, by which meanes all ſtrife and debate in Englande was appeaſed.

Whileſt theſe things were a doing in England, earle Iohn went to Chinon where king Richards treaſure laie, which treaſure, with the Caſtle, was deliuered to him by Robert de Turnehame. But Thomas de Furneis deliuered vnto Archure Duke of Byſtaine, the citie and Caſtle of Angiers, for as well by him, as by all other the nobles and pères of the countreies of Angiew, Paine, and Turon, Archure was receiued as their ſoueraigne Lord. Moreover, Conſtancia mother to the ſaid Archure, deliuered him to the king of France at Turon: whom he ſent to Paris to be kept, and tooke into his hands all the Caſles and Cities that appertained to the ſaid Arthur: but Earle Iohn and Elianor his mother, came with a great army to the Citie of Paris, and won both it and the Caſtle, deſtroyed all the ſtone houſes there, and carried the citizens away captiues. This being done, Earle Iohn entring into the countrey of Anſow held his Caſſer at Beaufort, and on the morrow after, he ſent Quene Elianor and Marchadius vnto the Citie of Anſow, who with a warlike power ſpoyled it, and carried the citizens away captiues.

In which meane time earle Iohn came to Roan, and there by the miniſterie of Walter Archbiſhop of Roan, he was giſt with the ſword of the dukedome of Normandy, in the Cathedraſſall church, where the Archbiſhop before the high altar, did ſet a Crownet of golde vpon his head, artiſcially made with Roſes of golde, &c. Duke Iohn ſware vpon the holy Euangelists to defend the Church and liberties thereof, to ſee Juſtice miniſtered to the people, good lawes put in execution, and euill lawes ſuppreſſed.

Then Iohn Duke of Aquitaine ſayled ouer into England, and arrived at Shorham on the ſixe and twentieth daie of Maie, and came to London on the Aſcenſion euen, where the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Carles, Barons, and other being preſent, Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſtanding vp in the middell of them all, ſaid in effect as followeth:

Our diſcrete wiſedomes doe knowe (right honorable) that by moſt reaſon none ought to ſuccede in the kingdome, except by the vniuerſall conſent of the whole realme (praying for the grace of the holy gholt) he be choſen according to the excellencie of his qualities and behantour, by the example of the firſt appointed king Saul, whome our Lord appointed vnto his people, not being the ſon of any king, neither of the progeny of any king. Likewiſe, after him, he made David king, the ſonne of Iſhai, who was a ſtoute man, apt and mete for the worthy dignitie of a king, and that becauſe he was holy and humble, ſo that he which doth in ſuch ſort excel in prowelle all other in the kingdome ought to be choſen to gouerne the ſame: but if there be any of the kings linage that doth excell other, we ought to be readie to elect and chose him. This I speake touching the noble Duke Iohn, brother to our late excellent king Richard now deceased, which had none bettre proceeding of his bodie. Which Duke Iohn appeareth plainly vnto vs, to be both wary and stout, whom the refoze beseeching the holy ghost of his grace, we doe with one consent elect and chose, as being both of the same worthines, and also of the same blood and kinde: that king Richard was of.

Roger Wend.

This archbishop indeede was a man of deepe vnderstanding, a singular pillar of stabilitie, and of incomparable wisdom, so that no man was so bold as to make any reasoning of the matter at that time, because they knowe well enough that he did not without cause define in such sort of this thing: wherefoze the Duke Iohn, and all other there present did accept of the choise, crying, Vivat Rex. But afterwards, the archbishop being demaunded, why he made this election, he answered, and said, that by certaine Oracles, and by the gift of propheticie, he was certified, that this Iohn should once take to himselfe the realme and crowne of England, and should bring the same into great confusion: wherefoze, to the end he should not haue so much occasion to bring these thinges to passe, he saide, that he was so to be elected to the kingdome, though the same by succession of inheritance belonged not to him, and so he set the crowne vpon his head, and annointed him king at Westminster in Saint Peters church, vpon the Ascension day, which was the five and twentieth day of Maye: he was swozne to loue the catholike church and ordinances thereof: to keepe and defend the same harmlesse from the inuasion of euill disposed persons: to disanull peruerse lawes, and erect good lawes, and according to the same to minister true iudgement throughout his kingdome.

The same day king Iohn inuested William Marshall with the sword of the earledome of Striguile, and Geoffrey fitz Peter with the earledome of Essex, and they serued that day at the table with their swordes girt to them. Also Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, was made Lord Chancellour of England.

States created.

Whilest these thinges were in doing in England, Philip king of France with an army, brake into Normandy, and toke the citie of Euerr, the towne of Argues, and diuers other places from the English, and passing forth into Spaine, recovered that countrey. Also the Bytaines, wanne the townes of Cozney, Butevant and Genfoline: they toke also the city of Angiers, &c. Which being signified to king Iohn, he went ouer into Normandy, where many submitted themselves to him: but a truce was taken betwixt the king of France and him, vntill the 26. of August. In the meane time, king Philip of France made Arthur Plantagenet duke of Bytaine, knight of the field, and receiued of him homage for Aniove, Boitiers, Turon, Maine, Bytaine, and Normandy: for the which the said king Philip promised by othe to aide him in reuerie thereof.

King Iohn made a law, that no tunne of Rochell wine should be sold dearer then xx. shillings, of Aniove for xxiii. shillings, & of France xxv. shillings, and not aboue, vntill the same were of such principall goodnes, that some for their vse would giue xxvi. shillings liii. pence for the tun, and not aboue in any case.

A gallon (by retale) of Roshel wine to be sold for iiii. pence, the gallon of white wine not above vi. pence. It was also ordained, that in euery citie, towne and place where wine was sold to be sold, there should be xii. honest men sworn to haue regard that this assise should not be broken: and if that they found any Tintner that should sell any wine by small measures contrary to the same assise, his body should be attached by the Shriffe and detained in prison, till order was taken for his further punishment, and his goods seized to the kings use: and the like punishment was appointed for such as should sell by the tunne, hogthead, or otherwise, contrary to the assise.

Philip king of France, and Iohn king of England met betwixt the castles of Mtaplun, and Butenant, where they agreed upon a peace, that king Iohn should quite claime vnto the French king, and his heires for ever, all Milgeu, sin, Gisors, and other castles. Also king Iohn gaue in marriage with his nere Blanch, daughter to Alphonse, king of Castile, vnto Lewis, sonne and heire to Philip king of France, all the castles which the same Philip had taken in Poymandy, that is to say, Tienon, Dassep, Puery, and Bonancoxt, and many other cities, townes, castles, &c. besides to king Philip 30000. markes. King Philip then released Arthur to king Iohn, and receiued of him homage, for Brittanyne and Richmond, both kings swore to obserue this peace firme with their seale for ever.

King Iohn hauing made peace beyond the seas, returneth into England, where he requireth an aide of his realme to pay the thirty thousand marks, and edict was made, that euery plow land should paie thre shillings, which troubled the land sore, considering the exchequer that went afore, which was for euery knights fee two marks, which before time was neuer but twenty shillings. King Iohn went ouer, and hauing paid his thirty thousand marks to the king of France, he was there by the hands of Helias Archbishop of Burdeaur, and the Bishops of Poitiers, and Scone, diuorced from his wife Isabell, daughter to Robert Earle of Gloucester, because of nearnesse of blood, as touching her in the third degree: And then he married Isabell daughter to Americ Earle of Angouleme; which Isabel before Hugh surnamed Brunc Earle of Marches had taken to wife.

This being done, King Iohn returned with his new wife, and crowned her Quene at Westminster on the eight of October. And the same day king Iohn commaunded Hugh Neuill chiefe forester, and the other foresters to warne all the Monkes of the Cisteriaun order throughout England, that from the Decretanes of Saint Michael, vnto the Quindem, they should remoue all their hoxses, their swine, and other cattell whatsoeuer off the forest ground: and if any were after found vpon the forest ground, they should be sold to the kings use. The monkes prouided for themselves, and patiently bare the kings displeasure.

The archbishop of Canterbury sent to all the Abbots of that order, aduising them to mete the king at Lincolne on the xv. of Nouember, that being together, by his helpe they might attempt to appease the kings mode, they did as they were willed. The archbishop counselled them, the nexte day to mete the king without the city, and to humble themselves vnto him, but they thought not this to bee the best waie, lest those that rode before the king should abuse them.

King of Scots
did homage to king Iohn.

The next day king Iohn talked with William king of Scots that was come to Lincolne, with Roeland Lord of Galloway, and many other noblemen, to doe homage to the king.

The next day the Archbishoppe moued the king in the matter touching the Abbots, but the king willed him not to bere his spirits, for he meant that day to be let blood.

On Sunday next following, the archbishop caused the abbots to come into the kings presence at masse time: wherupon, after the king had heard masse, and comming forth of the church, the Archbishop besought him to heare their sute, and then they falling downe at the kings seate, besought him to haue pity vpon them: the king commaunded one to bring the Abbots into his chamber, and he with the Archbishop, bishops, and Nobles went into the same chamber before them, where, when they had sate a while, the king rose vp, and went into an inner chamber, there to conferre with the noblemen, such as pleased him; and after comming forth, called for the archbishop and certaine other bishops, with whome he talked secretly: and after the Abbots being called, the king appointed the Archbishop to declare vnto them his pleasure, which was, that although the king had shewed himselfe in wordes to be offended with them, yet he neuer meant hurt to that order, and now had put away all rancour and malice towards them: herewith they fell downe on the ground, and gaue humble thanks to the king, and withall, the archbishop inferred, that the king requested them to forgive him: and the king herewith fell downe, watering his cheekes with teares, and they likewise at his seate. The Archbishop, after both partes were vp on their seate, said, that the king required, that by their intercession he might be made a brother in the chapter of the Cisteriaur, and that they would procure him to be admitted: Wherevpon, the king, he saide, minded to build a house of that order, that he might be had in memorie, and would be a patron and defender of their order. The Abbots being greatly reioiced, departed, praising God.

King Iohn going into Ireland toke a great piece of money there, and returning into England, was crowned together, with his Quene at Canterbury on Easter day.

King Iohn with Isabel his Quene sailed into Normandie, fell in communication with Philip king of France, where they agreed so well, that they passed together into France, where king Iohn was honorably receiued at Saint Denys, and into Paris, &c.

An. reg. 3.
Hugh Brune
rebelled.

A nobleman of Aquitaine named Hugh Brune, rebelling against king Iohn invaded diuers parts of the prouince, because the king had maried the daughter of the Earle of Angoulesme, whome the said Brune had assied, and had in his custodie, wherefore they passed ouer, and restrained the rebelles from their attempts.

Prodigma.
Tempests.

The sixe and twentieth of June there arose a cruel tempest of thunder, lightning, ning, and haille, with a belement raine, that destroyed corne, castell, men, and houses, by burning them, &c.

The tenth of July, another tempest much like to the former hapned, so that the medowes could not be mowed, and the hay that was downe, was carried away by the outrageous course of waters that ouerslowed the ground, great numbers of fishes through the corruption of the waters died, manie bridges bozne downe, corne and hay carried away, and many men drowned, so that al men thought a new deluge had bene come.

King Iohn sharply warred vpon the Earle of March, Hugh Brune, and the earle of Que his brother, who being not able to resist, they complained to Philip king of France, as to their soueraigne and chiefe Lord, who sent oft times to king Iohn, mouing him to cease from vexing them, but that woulde not serue: wherefore he was sommoned by the nobles of France as duke of earle of Aquitaine and Anisw, to come vnto the court of the French king, and to stand to the iudgement of his peres, all which king Iohn denied: whereupon the same court adiudged him to be depriued of all his lands, which he of his predecessors helde of the king of France, &c.

King Philip forthwith assembled an army, and innaded the castle of Buteuant in Normandy, which Richard had builded, he rased it to the ground. He toke the land of Hugh Gorney, and all the Castles thereabout. He toke the Castle of Albemarle, with the countie of Que, and all the land to Arches, none resisting him. Also Arthur earle of Byptaine being made knight by the French king, whose yonger daughter he had affianced, he being but sirtene yeres old, went to Hugh Brune, and Geoffrey of Lucingham, and with two hundred and fiftie knightes, besieged the Castle of Pirable, in which Queene Elianor his Aunt was inclosed: but king Iohn came with a power, and deliuered his mother from danger. He toke there his Nephewe Arthure, William de Brawsa, Geoffrey de Lucingham, Hugh Brune, Andrew Caueny, Saluaricus de Mauleon, and diuers others.

Great thunder and lightning, with haille as bigge as hennies egges, &c.

The waters increased, and did much hurt in England: Arthur earle of Byptaine, from Falaise was brought to Roan, and put in the Tower vnder the custody of Robert de Veypont, where shortly after he was dispatched of his life, some say by the handes of his vncke Iohn.

The king of France innaded the castles of Normandy, toke Lille, Dandele, with the Castle, and the vale de Ruell, in the which were Robert fitz Walter, Sayer de Quincy, and manie other. Hee toke the strong Castle vpon Seine, builded by King Richard, which had bene valiantly kept by the constable of Chester.

Among many other that found themselves agreeded with the shamefull murder of duke Arthur, sonne to Geoffrey duke of Byptaine, king Iohns elder brothers sonne, and therefore rightfull heire to the crowne and realme of England, was Iohn Courcy the valiant conqueror, and earle of Ulster in Ireland: Which being brought to the kings eares, he cast the saide Courcy into the Tower of London. But the matter fell out hotter betwene the king of France

corn.

The foureteenth daie of Januarie beganne a frost, which continued till the two and twentieth daie of March, so that the ground coulde not be tilled, whereof it came to passe that in summer following, a quarter of wheate was sold for a marke of siluer in manie places of England, which for the moze parte in the daies of king Henry the second, was sold for twelve pence: a quarter of beanes or pease for halfe a marke: a quarter of oates for fortie pence, that were wont to be solde for foure pence. Also, the money was so lowe clipped, that there was no remedie, but to haue it reued.

Great tax.

King Iohn gathered great armies of men to haue gone ouer the Seas, but being sailed onward of his boiage, he returned againe, and toke escuage, two markes and a halfe of euerie knightes fee through Englande, pretending a quarrell quarrell against his barons, because they would not follow him into the parts beyonde the Seas.

The earle of Salisburie, the kings brother, Gessrey the kings son begot on a concubine, and manie other knightes, were gone ouer before, but al in vaine: the charges was inestimable that had bene layde out about the preparation made for this iourney.

Great thunders and lightnings bursting out of the clondes were scene, so that men thought that the day of Doome had bin come, many men and women were destroyed, beside cattell, and houses that were overthrowne, and burned. The corne in the fields was beaten downe with hailestones as big as gowse eggs.

About Maidstone in Kent, a certaine monster was found, stricken with the lightning, which monster had an head like an asse, a belly like a man, and all other parts farre discordant from any one living thing. This dead bodie no man might turneth come nere unto for fench.

King Iohn toke the thirtieth part of all moueable goods, both of lay and religious throughe England, at which all men murmured.

The 27. day of January a great wind overthrow many houses and trees, and a great snow destroyed manie beasts.

The monkes of Canterburie, by the aduise of the Pope, elected Stephen Langton to be their Archbishop, and then Pope Innocent intending to obatine the fauour of king Iohn towards this election, because hee knewe that hee did make diligent search for precious stones, sent him an eloquent Epistle, with diuers precious Jewelles, which were of king Iohn well accepted: and Stephen Langton was consecrated at Rome. Then the Pope sent letters to king Iohn, humble exhorting him to receiue the saide Stephen Archbishop of Canterburie, beeing thereunto canonicallie elected, the rather because hee was an Englishman borne, and a doctor of diuinitie, &c. But king Iohn being greatlie offended with the promoting of the saide Stephen, sent men in armour to expell the monkes of Canterburie, to the number of thre score and foure out of the Realme, and condemned them of treason, the monkes went into Flaunders, and their goods, and lands of their church was confiscate. Also king Iohn sent threatening letters to the pope, whereunto the pope made a large answere.

All the bodie of them that died, were buried like dogs in ditches and corners: Manie Bishops, especially they that pronouncd the interdiction, fled the Realme.

The king set all the bishopricks and abbetes in the realme into the custody of lay men, and commanded all Ecclesiasticall reuenues to bee confiscated. Also doubting lest the Pope shoulde excommunicate him by name, or discharge the nobles of England of their allegiance towards him, he laid holde vpon them, specially

The Welshmen toke diuers Castles of the king of Englands, cut off the heads of all the souldiers, burned many towncs, and with a great pray returned without any harme.

The king gathered a great army, minding utterly to destroy all the coastes of Wales, but when he came to Pottingham, he caused eight & twenty pledges of the Welshmen to be hanged, and immediatly after, whilst he sat at meate, there came a messenger, that brought him Letters from the King of Scots, informing him, that he should be betrayed; and likewise also came another messenger out of Wales, from the kings daughter, wife to Lewline king of Wales, certifying him of the same conspiracie, that is to say, that if he did not leaue off and desist from that he had begun, his nobles would either kill him themselves, or else betray him to his enemies to be killed.

Wherefore, when the king came backe to London, he sent messengers to all the great men whome he suspected to be vntrue to him, and demanded pledges of them, who daring not disobey the kings commandment, sent to him their sonnes, nephewes, and kinsfolke to be at the kings pleasure.

Peter of Pontfrelle.

About this time in the prouince of Poike, there was an Heremite named Peter of Pontfrelle, who was also called the Wolfe, because hee had declared vnto many diuers strange things that were to come. This Heremite prophesied openly of king Iohn, and said, that vpon the Ascension day next comming, there there should be no king, nor from thenceforth, but he said the crowne should at that day be translated to another. Whereof, when the king heard tell, he commanded this Heremite to be brought vnto his presence, and demanded of him, whether the king should die as that day, or no, or else, in what order the king should be depriued of his raigne. The Heremite answered, I knowe this most certainly, that at that day, thou shalt not be king: and if I be found a liar, then doe with me what ye will. And the king said it should be euen so, as thou hast saide, and so committed him to William de Hartcourt to keepe, and he kept him in streight prison, vntill he sawe the end.

There were at that time manie noble men in England, whose wiues and daughters the king had oppressed, and othersome, whome with extreme exactions hee had brought into great pouertie, and othersome, whose parents and friends the king had banished, and had turned their inheritance vnto his own vse: so that king Iohn had almost, as many enemies as hee had nobles, and great men, and the report was that they did send their writing and charter to the king of France, sealed with their seales, wherein they promised him, that if he would come and invade England, they would receiue him, and crowne him with honour.

About this time, Stephen Archbishop of Canterburie, William Bishoppe of London, and the Bishop of Ely, went to Rome, and informed the Pope how many enuious deedes king Iohn with great contumacie had done against God and his holy Church: wherefore they humbly besought him to helpe and succour the church of England, which now was in great danger. Whereupon the Pope determined, that king Iohn should be deposed, and another more worthy set in his place: Toward the execution whereof, the Pope wrote his letters to king Philip of France, willing him to expulse the king of England, and he should for euer possesse the kingdome.

The tenth daie of Iuly at night, a marvellous and terrible chance happened, for the Citie of London vpon the South side of the riuer of Thames, with the Church of our Lady of the Chanons in Southwarke being on fire, and an exceeding great multitude of people passing the bridge, either to ertingualty and quench, or else to gaze, beholde, sodainly the north part, by blowing of the South winde was also set on fire, and the people which were euen now passing the bridge, perceiving the same, would haue returned, but were stopped by fire, and it came to passe, that as they staied, or protracted time, the other end of the bridge also, namely the South end was fired, so that the people thronging them selues betwixt the two fires, did nothing else expect or looke for then death. When came there to aide them many ships and vessels, into the which, the multitude so vndiscerately pressed, that the ships being drownded, they all perished: it was said, through the fire and the shipwrack, that there were destroyed about thre thousand persons. William Packington writeth, that there were found in part or

him with this, that he should use the wife of his brother Geoffrey Earle of Britaine, whome Ranulph earle of Chester had married, and from whome Ranulph was divorced by the counsell of king Iohn, and the said earle had married the daughter of the earle Ferrers.

King Iohn being now in extremity, and minding to impute the fault to them that would not appease his fury aforesetyme, reprehended sometimes one, and sometimes another of his nobility as traitors, calling them iealous, whose beds (as he bragged) he had defiled, and defloured their daughters.

The Chronicle of Dunmow saith, this discord arose betwixt the king and his barons, because of Mawde called the Faire, daughter to Robert Fitz Walter, whome the king loved, but her father would not consent, and thereupon ensued warre throughout England. The king spoiled especiallie the Castell of Baynard in London, and other holdes and houses of the barons. Robert Fitz Walter, Roger Fitz Robert, and Richard Mounte Fitchet passed over into Fraunce, some also went into Wales, and some into Scotland, and did great damage to the king. Whilset Mawde the Faire remained at Dunmow, there came a messenger unto her from king Iohn about his suit in love, but because she would not agree, the messenger poisoned a boiled or potched Egge against she was hungry, whereof she died, and was buried in the quier at Dunmow.

At this time also king Iohn subtilly, to excuse himselfe withall, demanded and obtained of all religious persons, a writing, wherein they acknowledged, that they had willingly given the king al that he had with violence taken from them.

About this time, the king of France wasted the king of Englandes landes beyonde the Seas, and the king of England likewise wasted his: but at the length a truce was taken, and an arme of the Sea being betwixt either hoste, there was a Knight in the Englishe hoste that cryed to them of the other side, willing some one of their knightes to sust a course or twaine: whereupon without state, Robert Fitz Walter made himselfe readie, ferried over, and got on his horse without anie man to helpe him, and beeing readie against the face of his enimie, at the first course hee stroke the other so hard with his great speare, that horse and man fell to the ground, and when his speare was broken, he went backe againe to the king of France: by Gods tooth (quoth king Iohn) he were a king in dede that had such a knight. Roberts friendes hearing that, kneeled downe, and saide, O king he is your knight, it is Robert Fitz Walter: and the next daie he was sent for, and was restored to the kings fauour, and by his meanes peace was concluded, and he received his lininges, and had leave to repaire his castels, &c. Thée the most forcible and valiant knightes of England in those daies were Robert Fitz Walter, Robert Fitz Roger, and Richard Mount Fichet.

King Iohn caused a great armie to be gathered at Douer in the Lent season, and gathered together a great naue of Ships, and whilset he remained about the Sea coast with his force to withstande the French king when hee shoulde come, there arrived two brethren of the Temple at Douer, which came to the king and in friendlie manner saide unto him: Wlce bee sent unto thée (most mightie mightie king) in the behalfe of Pandolph, who for the commoditie of you & of your realme desireth to haue talke with you, for he hath to propound vnto you a certaine forme of peace, where by you may be reconciled to God, and to the Church, notwithstanding that you be condemned by sentence in the court of Rome to be deposed from the title of your realme.

When the king had considered well the message of those templars, he gaue them commaundement to cause Pandolph to come ouer vnto him. And not long after, Pandolph came to the king at Douer, and said vnto him: Behold, Pandolph the Legate. the most mightie king of France lieth with an invincible number of ships, and a great multitude of knights, horsemen and footemen in the haven, ready to come ouer to invade, and depose you, as a rebell vnto God, and vnto his Pope: there come with him also the Bishops that of late were banished out of England, with the clarkes and lay men, to the end, that whether ye will or no, they hauing the French king to their captaine, they may receiue their bishopricks and goods.

The king of France also doth boast that he hath Charters almost from all the Nobles of England of their allegiance and subiection vnto him, so that thereby he doubteth not but to bring his purpose to passe. Nowe therefore at the last looke to your owne commoditie, that you may come to repentance, and make no delay to reconcile you to God, whom you haue prouoked to take vengeance vpon you. For if you make assurance, that for his sake, which humbled himselfe for you, you will humble your selfe to the iudgement of the Church, you may recouer your realme: from which, for your contumacie you be adiudged and condemned by the court of Rome to be deposed. Nowe therefore that your enemies doe not resolue ouer you, turne into your owne heart, and take heed that you doe not bring your selfe into such a distresse as you shall not be able to ridde your selfe out againe.

With these words King Iohn was moued to repentance, chiefly considering 4. things. The first, for that he stood excommunicate the space of five yeres. The second, he feared the coming of Philippe king of Fraunce, which lay round about the Sea coastes with a great force, prepared to depose him. Thirdly, he feared, that if he should loine battell with his enemies, the nobles of England would either leaue him in the field, or deliuer him to his enemies. And the fourth, which he feared most, was because Ascension day was at hand, when according to the prophetic of Peter the Hermitte, he should lose both his life, and kingly authoritie, both spirituall and temporall. For these and such like causes, King Iohn being fallen into desperation, did followe the perswasion of Pandolph, and toke his othe vpon the Euangelists, that in the presence of Pandolph, he would stand to, and obey the iudgement of the Church, and 16. of his Barons and Nobles did sweare the same, and couenanted that if he peradventure should repent him of his othe, they would compell him, so much as lay in them to performe it. Thus on the 13. of Maie, on Sunday before Ascension day, the King and his Nobles, Barons, and Nobles, mette with Pandolph at Douer, where with one consent they agreed vpon a forme of peace.

When the Ascension day was past, he commanded the foresaid Peter the Hermite to be fet out of the castle of Corke, to be bounde to a Horse-taile, drauone through the streets to Warham, and there both he and his son to be hanged on a gibbet.

roure, and of the Dukes of Louaine, Brabant, and Hollande, of Reignolde Carle of Boloigne, and Ferrandis Carle of Flaunders, so that there was a greate ffielde fought, in which the French King escaped narrowlie, but being rescued, hee tooke the foresayde Carles, put Hugh de Bones to flighte, and drove the Emperour out of the ffielde, and then a Truce was taken betwixt King Iohn and the king of Fraunce for five yeeres, by the Popes commandement, as some saie, but as other saie, this truce was agreed by meanes of 6000. marks, which the king of England gaue, fearing to incounter with the great multitude of Frenchmen.

King Iohn having finished his warres beyond the Seas, as y<sup>e</sup> have heard, came ouer into England, about the fourteenth of Nouember. And the same time the Carles and Barons of the Realme, especiallie them of the North, came to talke with the king, hee being then at Saint Edmundesburie, but their intent was not only to talk with him, as well appeared: for after they had a long season handled the matter among themselves, they brought forth the charter of king Henry the first, which they had receiued of Stephen the Archbish, wherof we haue made mention here before. And so they came together into S. Edmonds Church, where the chiefest of them beganne, and they all sware by the High Altar, that if the king would not graunt the foresayde Lawes and Liberties, they would make warres against him, and withdraue themselves out of his allegiance, vntill hee did with his Seale confirme and ratifie the same. And they consented all on this, to come to the king after Christmas, and in the meane season they would provide themselves both of armor, horses, and munition.

Fishes of vnwonted shape were taken in England, for they were armed with helmets and shields, in outward shape they resembled, and were like vnto armed knights, sauing that they were far greater in proportion.

Almost the whole towne of S. Edmondsburie was consumed with fire.

The king being lodged in the newe temple at London, there came to him, the foresaid noble men in warlike order, demanding of him to confirme the Liberties of king Edwards Lawe and other: the king requiring respitte till Easter, was faine to put in sureties the Archbyschop of Canterburie, the Byschop of Ely, and other, to satisfie all men in that behalfe, and then the Noble men returned. The king in the Church of Saint Paul at London, at the hands of William Byschop of London, took on him the signe of the Crosse of the holie Land, by meane thereof to be in the better safeguard: the earles of Chester and Darby did the like. In the Easter weeke the noblemen in armor met at Stamford, and after at Barkeley, whither came to them from the king, the Archbyschop of Canterburie, William Marshall with other, to demaund of them what they would haue confirmed, and the nobles deliuered to them a scedule, confesning the olde Lawes and customes, which except the king would graunt, they would take the castles of his lands, and so compell him.

The 17. daie of Maie being Sundate, the Barons came to London, and entered through Aldgate, in the seruice time, where they tooke such as they knewe fauoured the king, and spoiled their goods. They brake into the Houses of the the Jewes, and searched their Coffers, to suffice their olone purses that had bene long emptie. After this Robert fitz Walter, and Geoffrey de Maundeuill Earle of Essex, and the Earle of Gloucester, chiefe leaders of the armie, applied all diligence to repaire the gates and walles of the cite, with the stones of the Jewes broken houses. The Tower of London yet held out, though there were fewe within to defende it. When it was noyced that the Barons had London, all (except the Earles of Warren, Arundell, Chester, Pembroke, Ferrers, and Salisbury, and the Barons, William Brewer with other) went to those Barons that were against the king, who called themselves the Armie of God, whereby such a feare came on the king, that hee durst not peepe out of Windsor Castle: at length he appointed to meete with the Barons in a meddowe betwixt Stanes and Windsor, which appointment hee obserued, and there graunted the liberties, without anie difficultie, the charter whereof is dated: Given by our hand in Kunningmede, betwixt Stanes and Windsor, the 16. of June, the 17. of our raigne, vnto which, all the whole Realme was sworne.

Whiles the Barons returned home, the king being left almost alone, hee sent Pandolph the Legate with other to Rome, to the ende that by the Apostolicke authoritie, he might make frustrate the purpose of the Barons. Also hee sent Walter Bishop of Winchester, and Iohn Bishop of Norwich, with other, vnto the Realmes next adioyning, to procure him souldiers, promising them lands, and large possessions: By meanes of Pandolph, the Pope disanulled the foresaide Charter and liberties graunted, and also excommunicated the Barons. By the other messengers were procured a great number of men of war, which landing at Douer, the king forthwith besieged Rochester, coueting to burne the Bridge, that no aide should come to the besieged: but Robert Fitz Walter defended the Bridge, and quenched the fire, neuertheless after long assault the castle was yielded.

As a great number of strangers were on the Seas, minding to haue landed at Douer, to haue ayded the king against his Barons, through a sudden tempest they were all drowned, so that about the coast of the Sea, was cast vp such a multitude of men, women, and children, that the aire was soze infected with their putrified bodies: It was saide that of forty thousand, there escaped not one alive. The king had promised to this people, the Countreies of Norfolk, and Suffolke.

From thence they went to Saint Edmondesbury, and so to the Isle of Ely, which which Ile they besieged, because diuers knightes and Ladies were fledde thither with their substance: and those robbers entring the Isle, spared neither sere nor state, but by tormentes compelled them to tell where their treasure lay.

About the Epiphanie Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, and other, returned from beyonde the seas, bzinging with them one and forty ships laden with souldiers: and about the feast of the Purification of our Ladie they besieged Colchester Castle, but hearing that the Barons that were at London made hast to come and succour the Castle, they went backe to Saint Comon, desburie.

The king with his army was long time on the Scottis Seas, and oftentimes inuaded the Lands of his Barons in those coasts, burning their Castles, and spoiling their goods, in which expedition he went so farre, that it was not well known what was become of him, insomuch, that he was nopsed to be dead, and secretly buried at Reding.

King Iohn invaded the lands of his Barons.

Geffrey Mandeuill died at London of a wound received in inslking: he was buried in the Pryorie of the Trinitie at London.

The Pope excommunicated the Barons by their pecoliar names, but the Chanons of S. Paul in London, and many other Ecclesiasticall persons, with the Barons that remained at London, appealed against this sentence, taking exceptions against it, as pronounced by false suggestion.

The Barons excommunicated.

The Barons sent Sayre de Quincy and other, to Philip king of France, earnestly requesting him to send his sonne Lewis into this Realme, promising to make him king thereof, which the French king refused to doe, till the Barons had sent him foure and twenty pledges of the best mens sons in the kingdome, and then hee sent them aide. Gwalo the Legate was sent from the Pope into France, to forbid Lewis to go into England, but his perswasions nothing prevailed, wherefore he excommunicated them. Also the Abbot of Abingdon, renewed the excommunication against the Barons, the citizens of London, and the French, which came to their aide. About Midlent the king besieged the Castle of Colchester, and after a few daies it was deliuered to him by the French men that kept it, with condition that they might depart free, with all that belonged to them, and that the Englishmen should be suffered to depart vpon reasonable ransom, notwithstanding the Englishmen he put in streight prison. After the R. had taken Widingham castle, belonging to Robert de Vere Earle of Orford, he made haste to besiege London, but the Londoners set open their gates, and were ready to make with the king ten miles off the city: the king vnderstanding their bolones and multitude, he withdrew himselfe, but Saumarie de Malone, being suddenly set vpon by the Londoners, losing many of his men, was sore beaten and wounded almost to death.

In the meane time the king hauing knowledge that Lewis meant to come into England, he sent ouer to the French king, the Bishoppe of Winchester, William Marshall the elder, and other, to try if they could perswade the French k. to stay his son from that iourney, but they returned without audience. The king therefore marching along the Sea coast fortified his Castles, and getting pledges of the fine Ports, gathered a great multitude of ships of Parmonth, Linne, Dunwich, and other hauens, fraught them with men of warre, and determined to encounter the Frenchmen by Sea, when they came to arrive in England, but by tempest that arose from the North, those shippes were brouled, drowned, or driuen into the South parts of the sea, Lewis hauing al his power ready at Caleis, Chauling, and Whitland, the Northeast winde comming about, he set forward toward England, and with some difficulty, because it was a side winde, he landed at Stonar, in the Isle of Thanet, the 21. daie of May. From which place he directed his Epistles of title and claime, &c. as are set downe in my larger History. King Iohn being then at Douer, because his soldiers were strangers, durst not go against Lewis, but fledde towards Olford. Lewis went straight to Canterbury, where he receiued both castle and citie into his subiection, and after all the other castles in Kent, Douer only excepted: then came he to London, where he was honorably receiued of the Nobles and Citizens, who altogether sware fealty to him, and did him homage at Westminster: after this taking the castles of Rygat, Guldfofd and Fernham, he hastid forward to take the king, who as he heard was at Winchester, and had raised by the Standard of the Dragon, as he had meant to giue battell to Lewis, if he came to offer it. But when king Iohn heard that Lewis approached, he laide downe his Dragon, set fire on foure parts of the citie and fledde. The Citizens quickly quenched the fire and went forth to meete Lewis, receiuing him fully into their Citie, and sware fealtie to him. Here came to him in manner all the Carles and Barons of the Realme: then taking the castle of Olfham, and the Tower of London, he returned into Kent, and the 22. of July he besieged the castle of Douer, and continued the same till the 14. of October: then Hubert de Brugh and Gerard de Scoting, being not able longer to abide the assaults, obtained truce, that they might send to king Iohn for succour. Whilste this siege remained, king Iohn went about the land, consuming with fire and sword the possessions of the Barons.

Alexander king of Scots hauing subdued to Lewis all Northumberland, sauing Barnard castle, with the Barons of the North, came vnto Canterbury to Lewis, and did him homage, for that which he ought to hold of the king of England, and as he came towards Lewis with a great army, for feare of king Iohns power, as he passed by Barnard castle, which was in the fee of Hugo de Balioll, in the County of Holywarke folke, he with his Nobles of that countrey went round about the Castle to see whether it were wreake in any place, and assaultable, and a certaine archer within the Castle shot a dart, and smote Eustach de Veslay vpon the fore head, and pierced his braine, so that he died immediately. This Eustach was a noble and mighty man, and had married the k. of Scots sister, so that the king, and the noble men were sore abashed: and then the king of Scots had done his homage, he returned home into his countrey.

About this time it chanced that the Viscount of Melin a noble man of France, which came with Lewis into England lay very sicke in the Citie of London, who when he knew that death approached, called to him certaine of the Barons of England, unto whom he declared in effect as followeth: I am forie brethren, for your subuersion, and desolation, whereof you know nothing: for Lewis and sixtene of the Carles and Barons with him haue sworne, that if it be his chance to subdue England, and to be crowned king, he would banish out of the realme for euer, al these which now doe take his part, and persecute king Iohn, as traitors to their king, and will rote all their kindred out of the earth, and to the ende, you shall not doubt hereof to be true, I which now lie here a dying, vnder perill of my soule, affirme this to be true, and that I was one that did sweare the same with Lewis. Now therefore from henceforth prouide for your owne commoditie, and profit, and kepe this secret which I haue told you, and when he had said this, he died. The Barons perceiuing what danger they were in by Lewis, who had giuen to the French men the lands and castles which pertained to the Barons, and when anie murmured against Lewis, he cast in their teeth, that they were traitors, &c. they believed what the noble man had told them. This did also much increase their heauinesse, that they were euerie day excommunicated, and depriued of all earthly honour, so that they were in great anguish both of body and soule: Wherefore many deuised how to returne into the alleageance of king Iohn.

The Viscount of Melin his confession.

The king marched through Norfolk and Suffolke, till he came to Linne, where the Colonelmen receiued him with great ioy, and honoured him with large giftes, there he appointed Sauarike de Malion to bee Captaine, who beganne to fortifie the Colone: but here (as it was false) filling his belly too much, as he was thereto greatly giuen, he gotte a surfeit, and therewith all fell into a flure. Afterward taking his iourney towardes the North, in the water which is called Millstreme (they saide) hee lost sodainely all the Cartes and chariots, with his treasure, and precious princely vessel, and furniture of his chappell, which he set most by, for the earth opened in the midst of the waues on the marshes, and the whirlepit of the depe so swallowed by both men and horses, that none escaped to bring king Iohn tydings. The king with his army going before, escaped very narrowly, and men said, that night he lay at the Abbey of Swinshene, where he remained two daies, and there (as men supposed) he toke such heauines of heart for the losse of his treasure in the washes, that he was taken with an extreame ague, and began to be verie sore sicke, the pernicious greedy eating of peaches, and drinking of new cider, increased his sickness, and kindled the heate of the ague the more strongly, notwithstanding in the very breake of the day, with great paine, he went to the castle of Slesford in Lindsey, belonging to the Bish. of Lincoln. There he was let blood (saie some) but so it happened, that about this time, to wit, on the 14. of Octob. Hub. de Burgo & Gerard de Soing, being not able longer to abide his assaults of Lewis & his complices, obtained of him truce, that they might send to King Iohn for succour, which messengers, when they were come to Slesford and had declared their case, that is, that except he would rescue them in the castle of Doner, the same must be deliuered by to Lewis: his disease with griefe conceived there at, increased much, so that on the next morning, he could scantly on horsebacke come to the castle of Newmarke, which castle also belonged to the said Bish. of Lincoln, in which place the sickness so increased in the space of 3. or 4. daies, that he took the counsell of his Confessor, and receiued the Sacrament at the hands of the Abbot of Crorton, and then he made Henry his eldest sonne, the heire of his kingdome, causing all that were about him to sweare to him, and sent Letters sealed with his own seale, to all the Sheriffes of England, & castle keepers, willing them to be attendant and diligent to the said Henry. When these things were thus done, the Abbot of Crorton asked him if he should chance to die, where he would haue his body buried: To whom the king answered and said, I commit my soule to God, and my body to S. Albane, and afterward, to witte, in the night which followed next after the feast of S. Luke, he departed this life in the said castle of Newmarke, from whom his seruants taking al that was about him fled, not leauing so much of any thing (worth the carriage) as would couer his dead carcase. At the time of king Iohns death, there came to him messengers of certaine Barons of England, to the number of 40. with letters requiring to haue come againe to his peace, & allegiance, but he lying in the extremities of death coulde not giue attendance to them, he deceased on the nineteenth of October, Anno 1216. when he had reigned 17. yeres, five moneths, lacking eight daies, at the age of 51. yeres. The Constable of the castle, caused the kings body to be bowelled by the Abbot of the Chanons at Crorton, which Abbot was expert in Physicke, and also at that time, the kings Physition, to the end it might be the more honourably caried, his bowels being powdered, were buried in the Abbey of Crorton, vnto the which Abbey, king Iohn had on his death-bed giuen tenne pound the yere of god land for ever, his body was honourably conueyed to Worcester, and there buried in the Cathedral Church, nere vnto the body of Bishop Vllane.

Thus haue I set downe the life (though much abridged) and death of king Iohn, after the writing of Rog. Windouer, Rad. Niger, Rad. Cogshall, a namelesse Chanon of Barnewell, Mathew Paris, and other, who all liued when the king reigned, and wrote for that time what they saw, or heard credibly reported. Notwithstanding, I thinke good (as heretofore) to set downe concerning his death, as is reported by a namelesse Authour, a continuor of Geoffrey Monmouth, in the raigne of Edward the third, and since increased, printed by William Caxton, and therefore called Caxtons Chronicle. This booke (I saie) and other after-commers report, that king Iohn was poisoned by a Monk of Swinested abbey in Lincolnshire, for saying that if he might liue halfe a yere, he would make an halfe penny loose of bread, worth 11. shillings, &c. as ye may reade in the said common English Chronicle. But to conclude, howsoeuer he died, certaine it is, that he reigned with trouble ynough, as by the premises may appeare.

King Henrie the third.

HENRIE borne at Winchester, the eldest sonne of Iohn, of the age of nine yeeres, began his raigne the nineteenth of October, in the yere 1216. hee was crowned at Gloucester on the 28. day of October, by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Jocelyne Bishop of Bathe, in the presence of Walo the Legate, Syluester Bishop of Worcester, William Bishop of Co-

uentrie, and many other Prelates, Isabell the Quene, Ranulph Earle of Chester, William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, William Earle Ferrers, William de la Bruere, Sauaric de Maulion, Iohn Marshall, Philip de Albineto, with the Abbots and other in great number: being crowned by common consent, the Government of the king and kingdome was committed to the Legate, to the Bishoppe of Winchester, and to William Marshall Earle of Pembroke. These thinges being knowne abroade, those that were of the contrary part, toke great indignation thereat: and because there should be no hope left to the new king to preuaile against them, they toke a solemne oath, and swore they would neuer holde any lande of any heire of king Iohn; but the Legate maintaining the kings part, admonished, prayed, and commanded them that were disobedient to the king, to doe the like as he did, he calling a councell at Wyke, caused the bishops and prelates to incline to his part: notwithstanding, Lewis did what he could to the contrary, spoyling their goods, and possessions, yet could he not get one of the prelates to doe him homage, or feaultie. William Marshall Earle of Pembroke perswaded the Viscountes, Castle keepers, and other to doe their seruices to the young king Henry, promising them great gifts, and large possessions, whereby they serued king Henry much more faithfully then they did L. Iohn his father, for they thought y<sup>e</sup> the iniquity of the Father ought not to be imputed vnto the son. This did also greatly encourage them, when they vnderstood that every Sunday Lewis and his complices were excommunicated: Lewis and the Barons being not able to winne Douer Castle, determining therefore to subdue the smaller castles first, they remooued their siege, and came to London where on the first of Nouember, the Tower of London was deliuered to them. From thence Lewis with the Barons went and besieged the Castle of Hartford, from the twelfth of Nouember, till the first of December, on which day the castle was yelded: about the same time his men had won the Isle of Ely, all except a fortefse within the same, wherin the kings people were inclosed. The citie of Lincolne also being won againe by his partakers, & the castle besieged, Lewis wēt to Barkhamsted, and besieged the

the castle there. In time of which siege, there went out of the castle certaine knights and souldiers, who with violence entred vpon the Barons, toke their Chariots with their carriages, and the Standard of William de Mandeuill, and returned into their castle therewithall: but in the end, after long siege, by the kings commandement, they yielded the castle to Lewis on the 20. of December.

On the next morning Lewis came to Saint Albons, and demanded of the Abbot to doe vnto him homage, which the Abbot refused; but Lewis swearing he would set the Abbey on fire, the Abbot after manie threats, by the perswasion of Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, fined himselfe and the whole towne for 80. markes of siluer. Which being done, Lewis returned to London: And a truce was taken till the Octaues of the Epiphanie. The feast of Christmas being past, the truce yet continuing, Lewis called his fauourers vnto a Councell at Cambrydge, and the Gouvernors of the king called the like councell at Drford. All these laboured to haue compounded vpon a peace, or at the least to haue prolonged the truce, but when truce could not be prolonged, Lewis besieged the Castle of Heddingham, and at one selfe same time, the saide Castle, and also the Castle of Wyforde were both rendered, and so likewise were the Castles of Norwich and Colchester, for to haue the truce continued till a moneth after Easter: And by this meanes all the Cast partes of England fell to Lewis.

In this meane space, to wit, on the 20. day of January, the knights and souldiers of the Castle of Mount-sozell in Leicestershire went out to robbe, which when the knights and souldiers of Nottingham vnderstood, they met & fought with them, toke tenne of their knightes, fourtene of their souldiers, slew thre of them, and returned.

The towne of
S. Albons spoiled by Falcatus.

The 22. of Januarie, Falcatus de Brent, a wicked robber, hauing gathered a number of ruffians out of the Castles of Drford, Northampton, Bedford, and Windsor, came to the abbey of S. Albons in the euening, spoiled y<sup>e</sup> towne, toke men, women and children, and bound them verie sore, and slew some, so that the Abbot to saue the abbey and towne from burning, was faine to giue to Falcatus one hundred pound of siluer.

A truce taken.

About this time, the ambassadours of Lewis, which were at Rome about his busines there, did giue him to vnderstand, that except he went out of England, the sentence of excommunication, which Walo the Legate had pronounced against him, should be confirmed by the Pope, vpon Maundie thursday: for this cause therefore truce was taken betwene Lewis and king Henry vntill one moneth after Easter, all thinges to remaine in state as they then were.

Philip king of France called his sonne Lewis by spectall commandement, to returne into France, vnto a councell at Lyons, to be holden about Midlent, which thing the English men toke heauily, but hee refusing an othe on the Euangelists to returne before the truce should be expired, they were somewhat pacified. He being passed ouer, straight way William Earle of Salisburie, William Earle of Arundell, William Earle Warren, and many other, reuoluted to the kings side. Also William Marshall reclaimed William his eldest sonne come unto the kings allegiance: and thus became the part of Lewis weakened very much, and the kings power was greatly increased: And being divided into divers places, they besieged many castles at one time, recovering the castles of Marlebozow, Fernham, Winchester, Cicester, and other which they demolished.

In the feast of Easter, by procurement of William Marshall the elder, Ranulphe Earle of Chester, William Earle of Albemarle, William Earle Ferrers, Robert de Veteriponte, Brienus de insula, William de Entelope, Philip de Mere, Robert de Gangy, Falcatus de Brent, with his Castle keeper and manie other were gathered together, to besiege the Castle of Mount-forsell in Leicester shire, the chiefe keeper of which Castle was named Henrie de Braybrooke, who sent to Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, then at London with the French men, and requiring him to come to their aide: whereupon the saide Earle of Winchester, to whome the Castle belonged, went to Lewis, then lately returned out of France, requiring him to sende some aide to remove the siege, and so a power was sent out of London 600. knights, and 20000. armed souldiers, they had for captaines, Earle Patricius, the marshal of France, Sayer de Quincy, Robert fitz Walter, and other, who marching forward, spoiled
 S. Albons, the church at Rindborne, Dunstable, and so forth, toward the north, to raise the siege before Mount-forsell; but Ranulphe Earle of Chester, and other
 foresaid finding the siege to be removed, they march toward Lincolne, where Gilbert de Gaunt and other had laide siege: they assaulted the Castle sharpe-ly, but W. Marshall the elder sent thither a great power, such as would bee in this place so long to write, and therefore I referre the same to my larger booke. But to be short, these with much difficultie brake the gates of the Citie of Lincolne, and entring the towne, they boldly smote upon their enemies, and fought there a cruel battell, wherein the kings part so unhorsed the barons, that they slewe and toke the most part of them: which being done, the kings company fell upon the earle of Berch, & smote him through the braines, so that he fel downe dead. Thus when the greatest part of the French men were slaine, the residue toke them to flight, the Barons on the kings side following them that fledde, toke manie in the chase, amongst the which was taken Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, Henry de Bohune Earle of Hereford, Gilbert de Gaunt whome Lewis had lately made Earle of Lincolne, Robert fitz Walter, Richard de Mountfichet, William de Mowbray, William de Bellocampo, William Manduite, Almaricus de Hacary, Roger de Craffe, William de Caluile, William de Rose, Robert de Resperle, Radulph Chanduite, and many more. The kings souldiers spoiled the citie to the bare wals. This battell was fought on the 19.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester, to whome Peter Bishoppe of Winchester ministred all things necessarie.

This yere died Hugh Bishoppe of Hereforde, Hugh Foliothe Archdeacon of Salisbury,

Salisbury, William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, Gouvernour of the kings person and Realme, and David Earle of Huntingdon, brother to William king of Scots, William Marshall was honourably buried at London in the new Temple, vpon the 15. of Aprill, concerning whome a certaine Versifier made these verses:

Sum quem Saturnum sibi sensit Hibernia: Solem

Anglia: c Mercurium Normannia: Gallia Martem.

He was a noisome tamer of the Irish men, & honor vnto the English men, he had bene a merchant vnto the Normans, for he had purchased many things in it: vnto the Frenchmen he was a warrior, and an invincible knight. He left after him five sonnes, and five daughters, which daughters were thus married. Mawd to Hugh Bigot, Ioane to Warren de Mounthensy, Isabell to Gilbert de Clare, Sibill to William Earle of Darby, and Eue to Will. de Bruse, betwixt which five, all his great inheritance was after diuided, for all his sonnes died without issue, and were euerie one after other Earles of Pembroke. After the death of William Marshall, the king remained in custodie of the Bishop of Winchester.

About the same time, Lewis sonne to Philippe king of Fraunce, at the instance of his Father, went with a great army to the City of Tolouse, there to assaile the Heretikes called Albigenes, but hee preuailed nothing at all against them.

In the siege of that city, Simon Mountfort earle and captaine of Lewis army was slaine, and at another castle not far off, was slaine the brother of the said Simon, for the death of which two noble warriors, great lamentation was made, and Lewis returned againe into France without any victorie.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Warleborough.

About midlent Pandolph the Legate called a counsell at London, the archbishops, bishops, Abbots, and other being present, the Abbot of Welles was consecrated Bishop of Ely. Vnto the which Councell Robert sometime Abbot of Eborney brought the Popes letters, which commanded his Legate Pandolph and Steph. Archb. of Canterbury, that they should see the King to be newly crowned, because his first coronation, by reason of the troubles, was not so solemnly done as was decent: Whereupon order was taken, and on Whitunday he was crowned at Westminster by Stephen Langton archbishop of Canterbury.

Ralph Earle of Chester returned from Damata in the siege whereof hee had set forth himselfe and his people, with most large expenses, whereby hee wanted praise and honour before God and men: But Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, with Robert fitz Walker and other arriving at Damata, after the same was wonne, died there.

This yere on Whitson Euen, was the new worke of our Ladies chappel at Westminster begun, King Henry being the founder, who laid the first stone.

William of S. Maries Church, byshop of London, did of his owne free will resigne his bishopricke, the moxow after the connerfion of S. Paul, Eustach de Fawconbridge then treasurer of the Erchequer, was elected bishop of London, whose election was confirmed by Pandolph the legate. And the same Pandolph ceased from executing the office of legate, and returned to Rome.

The Friar Preachers, thirtene in number were sent into Englande, and hauing to their Prior: Gilbert de Fraxineto in companie of Peter de Roch Bish. of Winchester came to Canterburie, and there presenting themselves before the Archbishop Stephen, he commanded the said Prior to preach before him, and liked him so well, that he euer after loued their order. On Saint Laurence daie they came to London, and so to Orforde on the daie of the Assumption, in whose hono: they builded an Oratorie, and also those Scholes which since were called S. Edwards scholes, in whose parish they toke a place and there for a time remained, and after that remoued to the place without the wals, which the king assigned them.

King Henry subdued the Welshmen which rebelled.

The noblemen graunted to the king two markes of siluer of euerie hide of land.

Isabel the kings mother, without making her sonne or his Counsell priue to her purpose, went ouer into Fraunce, and there married with the earle of March Hugh Bronne, vnto whome she had bene betrothed before her first marriage with king Iohn.

King Henry gaue his sister Iane to Alexander K. of Scots, who married her at Forke: and Hubert de Burgh earle of Kent, and chiefe Iustice of England, married the king of Scots sister Margaret, William de Albencro earle of Arundell, died comming from the holy land, who was conueied into Englande, and buried at Wimondham, a Prior of his foundation.

A Proruinciall counsell was holden at Orforde, by Stephen Langton Arch-bishop of Canterburie, and his Suffragane byshops and others, in the conuentuall Church of Osney fiftene daies after Easter, where were degraded a priest and a Deacon, the Priest for homicide, the Deacon for sacrilege and the first committed. Another Deacon offending moze depely, denied the profession of Christian religion, and for the loue he bare to a Jewish woman, caused himselfe to bee circumcised, following the Jewish rites and customs: hee was degraded, and being left as a laie person and Apostata, was condemned and committed to the fire, by the seruantes of Falcatus, wherein he miserablie ended his life. There was also a yong man and two women brought before them, the yong man would not come in anie Church, nor be partaker of the Sacraments, but had suffered himselfe to be crucified, in whome the scars of all the wounds were to be seene, in his hands, head, side, and feete, and hee resolued to be called Iesus of these women and other. One of the women being old, was accused for bewitching the yong man vnto such madnes, and also (altering her owne name) procured herselfe to be called Mary the mother of Christ: They being consult of the se these crimes and other, were adiudged to be closed by betwene two walles of stone, where they ended their liues in miserie. The other woman being sister to the young man, was let go, because she reuealed the wicked fact.

On Saint Iames daie, the citizens of London kept games of defence and wrestling, nere vnto the Hospitall of Maulde, where they gotte the masterie of the men of the Suburbes. The Bayliffe of Westminster deuising to bee reuenged, proclaimed a game to be at Westminster vpon Lamas day, ther vnto the citizens of London repaired, & when they had plaide a while, the Bailie with the men of the Suburbes harnessed themselves and fell to fighting; that the citizens being foullie wounde, were forced to runne into the Citie, where they rang the common Bell, and assembled the Citizens in great number, and when the matter was declared, euerie man wished to reuenge the fact. The maior of the citie being a wise man and a quiet, willed them first to moue the Abbot of Westminster of the matter, and if hee woulde promise to see amendes made, it were sufficient: But a certaine Citizen named Constantine Fitz Arnulph, willed that all Houses of the Abbot and Bayliffe shoulde be pulled downe, which worde beeing once spoken, the common people issued out of the Citie without any order, and fought a ciuill battaile (for Constantine the first) pulled downe manie houses, and oft times with a loud voyce cryed, in praise of the said Constantine, the soy of the mountaine, the soy of the mountaine, God helpe, and the lord Lodowike.

A few daies after this tumult, the Abbot of Westminster came to London to Philippe Dawbney, one of the kings counsell, to complaine of the iniurie done to him, which the Londoners perceiving, besette the House about, and took by violence twelue of the Abbots Horses awate, cruellie beating of his men, &c. But whyles the foresaid Dawbney, laboured to pacifie the vyrgere, the Abbot gotte out at a backe doore of the house, and so by a boate on the Thames hardlie escaped, the citizens throwing stones after him in greate abudaunce. These things being thus done, Hubert de Burgo, Justiciar of England, with a great army of men came to the towre of London, and sent for the Maior and Aldermen, of whome hee enquired for the principall Authours of this faction. Then Constantine, who was constant in the sedition, was more constant in the answere, affirming that he had done it, and that he had don much lesse then he ought to haue done: The Justiciar toke him and two other with him, and in that morning early sent them to Falcarius by water, with a great number of armed men, who brought Constantine to the gallowes, and when hee sawe the rope about his necke, he offered for his life 15000. marks, but that woulde not saue him: so he was hanged with Constantine his nephewe, and Galside, that proclaimed his proclamation on the 16. of August.

Then the Justiciar entring the Citie with a great army, caused to be apprehended as many as he could learne to be culpable, whose sex and hands he caused to be cut off, which cruelty caused many to flee the Citie.

The king toke of the Citizens srtie pledges, which he sent to diuers Castles: he deposed the maior, appointing a Gardien or keeper ouer the citie, and caused a great gibbet to be made, & after heauy threatnings, the citizens were reconciled.

that ech man thought it had bene set on fire, and such a filthy stench arose with-all, that manie of the compante fell sicke thereof, and hardelie escaped death.
Likewise whilest the Bishop of London was at Chelmsford giuing orders, a greate tempest of winde and raine annoied such as came thither at that time:
whereof it may be gathered (saith mine author) how highlie God is displeased with such as come to receiue orders, to the end they may liue incontinently, and

King Henry kept his Christmas at Portsmouth, with the Archbysshop, and a great number of knightes, but the earle of Chester with other conspiratours against the king, kept their feast at Leicester, threatening the king and his iustici-

The earle of Chester and his complices, perceiving that the king had a greater number of men of armes then they, and also fearing the excommunication, came to the king at Southampton, yielding their Castles and honours which appertained to the crowne. Then the king laid siege about the castle of Bedford, that Falcatus had long kept by strength, which siege he continued by the space of eight weekes, and tooke the Castle on the fifteenth of August, on which daie he caused to be hanged to the number of eightie two men of armes and other Souldiers, Falcatus de Brent, who was fledde into Wales, hearing that the Castell was taken, and his men slain, under the conduct of the Bishop of Couentre, came to Bedford and fell at the kings feet, requiring mercy. King Henry failed into Bytaine, but lost his time to no good effect.

so great a power of horsemen and footmen, as never any of his predecessors at any time had the like, where there came unto him out of Ireland, Scotland, and Galloway, that the number was marvellous, thinking to have transported over such a power as were able to have won againe into his dominion all those lands that his father had lost: but when they came to take shipping, they wanted carriage for halfe the army; whereof when the king understood, he imputed al the fault to Hubert de Burgo Justiciar, and openly called him old traitor, casting him in the teeth, that hee had taken five thousande markes of the queene of France, to hinder his purpose, & in his rage, drawing out his sword, would have slaine the Justice, had not the Earle of Chester and other runne betwene, and boyded him away till the kings wrath was appeased.

At that time in the same haven arrived the Earle of Bytaine, who by other was bound to conduct the king into his land: but the said Earle and other persuaded the king to deferre that matter till Easter following, and the Justiciar was made friends with the king.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Pojke with the king of Scots, whome he had bidden to that feast, the Archbishop of that Citie being present, with the Carles and Barons, and a great family. His feast was royally kept three daies: and on the fourth, when the Sermon was ended, the king of Scots returned homeward with divers rich giftes, and king Henry passed towarde London.

Upon the day of Saint Pauls conversion, when Roger Niger bishop of London was at Masse in the cathedrall church of S. Paul, a great multitude of people being there, sodainly the weather waxed darke, that one could scantly see another in y church, and sodainly an horrible thunderclap lighted on the church, that the same was shaken as though it should have fallen, and out of a darke cloude came such lightning, that all the church seemed to be on fire, and such a stincke that all men thought they should have died. Thousands of men and women ranne out of the church, and being astonied, fell upon the ground bolde of all understanding, none of all the multitude tarried in the church, save the bishop and one deacon, which stode still at the high Altar awapting the will of God. And when the ayre was cleansed, the multitude came into the church againe, and the bishop made an end of his masse.

King Henry with a great army sayled into Bytaine, where, after hee had ranged the country, and made many spoiles, besieged the City of Haunts, and did nothing but spend great summes of treasure, the earles and Barons also, seeing that Hubert the Justiciar would not suffer them to do any thing against the enemies, they made baquets & feasts as they were wont to do in England, and tended nothing but eating & drinking: but the poorer sort of men, to maintaine themselves, sold all that they had, and beggered themselves for ever.

King Henry set all things in order for the keeping of the countrey of Bytaine, and so toke shipping, and on the 25. of October landed at Portsmouth, having spent and wasted an infinite summe of money, & given over unto death an innumerable number of noble men, or at the least brought them low with sicknesse and extream poverty. The 3. of May, the king sent his letters to the townsmen of Oxford, and Cambridge, rebuking them for their over high renting of their houses upon the scholars of the universities: commanding them therfore to temper themselves in their said rents, and that the same be rated according to the aunient custome of the said Universities by two masters, and two burgesses. Likewise the king hearing that the Universities were pestered with many that fained themselves to be scholars, the which were none indeede, he commanded the Sherriffes of Cambridge shire, and Oxford shire to make proclamation that no cleark should abide in any the said Universities, except he liued vnder the discipline and tuition of some master of a scholl, vpon paine of imprisonment of all such as should so remaine in any of the said towncs aboue 15. daies after the proclamation.

Leolin prince of Wales spoiled the lands of the Barons that were on the borders of Wales, wherefore the king gathered a great power at Oxford, and went against the Welshmen, and builded the castle of Mauid, which before had bene destroyed.

The vii. of April there appeared as it were foure sonnes beside the naturall sunne, of a red colour, and a great circle of cristall colour, from the sides whereof went out halfe circles, in the diuisions whereof, the foure sonnes went forth.

There followed that yere great warre and cruell bloodsheds, and generally great disturbance throughout England, Wales, and Ireland.

Dragons.

In the moneth of June in the south part of England by the Sea coast were seene two great Dragons in the aire, flying and fighting together a whole day, the one chasing the other to the deepe sea, and then were no more seene.

Robert and Roger Bacon.

The king being at Oxford, Robert Bacon openly preached against Peter bishop of Winchester, for that he euilly counselled the king to spoile the realme with Pictauians. Also Roger Bacon his brother both earnestly and pitifully perswaded the king to leaue the counsell of the said Peter. Also the Barons sent messengers to the king, requesting that he would put from him Peter Bishop of Winchester, and the Pictauians, or else they would depose him from his kingdome, and create a new.

and did liue laudably vnder a learned man appointed to gouerne them. He also builded the hospitall of S. Iohn without the east gate of Oxford for sick folke and strangers to be relieved in.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Gloucester, with a very small company, because many nobles were gone from him. At the which time there was such a frost, that the coine was destroyed in the ground, and the rootes of herbes in the gardens: this frost continued till Candlemas without any snowe, so that no man could plow the ground, and all the yere after was vnseasonable weather that barrenesse of all things ensued.

Richard Marshall and Leoline prince of Northwales, with a great force invaded the kinges lands, and destroyed the same with fire & sword, from the coasts of Wales to Salisbury, which towne also they set a fire. By the perswasion of Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, the king commaunded Peter Bishop of Winchester to go to his bishopricke, and also expelled all the Pictians into their owne Countrey, and making peace with Richard Marshall and Leoline prince of Wales, he called againe his naturall subiectes, and submitted himselfe to their counsell.

Richard Marshall in Ireland raising a warre there, by Geoffrey de Marisco, was slaine and buried at Bilkenny, Gilbert his brother succeded him in the earldome.

This yere was a great dearth and pestilence, so that many poore folkes died for want of victuals, and the rich men were stricken with couetousnes that they would not relieue them, amongst whom is to be noted, Walter Grey Archbishop of Yorke, whose coine being five yeres olde, doubting the same to be destroyed by vermine, hee commaunded to deliuer it to the husbandmen that dwelt in his manors, vpon condition to pay as much new coine after haruest, and would giue none to the poore for Gods sake. And it fortuned that when men came to a great sticke of coine nigh to the towne of Ripon belonging to the said archbishop, there appeared in the sheaves all ouer, the heads of worms, serpents and toads, and a voice was heard out of the coine-moune saying, Lay no hands on the coine, for the archbishop, and all that he hath, is the diuelles; to be short, the Bailiffes were forced to build an high wal round about the coine, and then to set it on fire, lest the venemous wormes should haue gone out and poysoned the coine in other places.

The same yere died Hubert Foliot bishop of Hereford, vnto whome succeded master Robert de Maydenstone, a famous learned man.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster in presence of the bishops and nobles of the realme.

The same yere was brought before the king seven Jewes, which at Norwich had stolen a boie, and kept him from the sight of the Christian people, by the space of one whole yere, and had circumcised him, minding also to haue crucified him in the solemnitie of Easter, as themselves confessed before the king, and were conuicted thereof, wherefore their bodies and goods were at the kings pleasure.

The king kept his Christmas at Winchester, where he made Baldwine de Riparis knight, and also earle of Wight, in presence of Richard earle of Cornwall, in whose custodie Baldwine had bene manie yeeres, and had married him to his wifes sisters daughter, the Lady Amicia.

Richard earle of Cornwall, the kings brother, took his journey towards Jerusalem, with many other noblemen of England. Upon S. Georges night, the stone gate and bulwarke which the king had caused to be builded by the Tower of London, was shaken with an earthquake, and fell downe, but the king commanded the same to be builded againe stronger then before. Leoline Prince of Wales deceased, and then betwixt his bastard sonne Griffin, and his legitimate sonne David, nephew to the king of England by his sister, great and greivous destruction rose for the principallitie, but at length Griffin being taken of his brother, was committed to prison.

Spanie strange and great fishes came ashore, whereof eleven were Seabuls, and one of huge bignesse passed by the river of Chamis, through the Bridge at London unhurt, till he came as far as the kings house at Portlake, where hee was killed.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, and many noble men with him, where, when the solemne service was done in the church, the king dining in the great hall of Westminster palace, did there place the Legate in the most honourable place of the table, to wit, in the middlest (which the noblemen tooke in euill parte) the king sate himselfe on his right hand, and the Archbysop of Poike on the left (for the Archbysop of Canterburie Edmund was dead) and then all the prelates and nobles according to their degrees, for so the king would haue it, and did himselfe set the guests.

The fourth day after Christmasse the Legate was by the Pope called home to the court of Rome: whereupon taking his leaue of all the Prelates, he took his journey towards the sea, whome the king with great pompe and an innumerable companie of the nobles, with trumpets sounding before them brought to

to the Seas; so that on the morrow after the twelfth date, the Legate (after the king with great sorrowe for his departure, had embraced him) took shipping, at Dover, at whose departure no man was soze but the king, and such as the Legate had enriched.

About the same time Peter of Sauoy, uncle to the Queene of Englande, to whome the king had given the earldome of Richmond, came into England.

Walter his brother hardlie obtayned the earldome, because hee procured that turneament, contrarie to the kinges will and pleasure. This Walter dying without issue, his heritage was divided betwixt the sonnes of his first sisters.

The walles and bulwarkes that were newlie builded about the Tower of London (in the building whereof, the king had bestowed more then twelue thousande markes) were againe unrecoverable throwne downe, as it were, with an earthquake, for wch chaunce the citizens of London nothing soze, were much amazed, for they were threatned, that the false walles and bulwarkes were builded in despight of them, to the end, that if any of them would presume to contend for the liberties of the city, they might there be imprisoned, and to the end, that many might be laid in diuers prisons, many lodgings were made there, that no one should speake with another.

The same yere Gilbert Bassett, through the stumbling of his horse, fell in a certain wood, as he went a hunting in the harvest time, and brake all his bones and sinewes, whereof in a few daies after he died, and shortly after his only son being but a child, died, whereby his inheritance came to Fulco Bassett deane of Worcester, brother to the said Gilbert.

Also about the same time John Byseth chiefe forester of England, departed this life.

The Templars in London, at this time in great glory, entertained the nobilitie, foraine Embassadors, and the prince himselve verie often, insomuch, that Mathew Paris crieth out on them for their pride, who beeing at the first so pome, as that they had but one horse to serue two of them (in token whereof they gaue in their scales two men upon one horsebacke) yet sodainelie they wared so insolent, that they disdained other orders, and toyted themselves with noble men.

Earthquake.

Upon S. Valentines euen there was a great earthquake in many places of England, especially at London, about the bankes of the Thamis.

Three halfe brethren to king
Henry.

There arrived here in England the three halfe brethren to the king, to witte, Guy de Lusignan, William de Valence, and Achelmar a cleerke, with their sister Alice: this was the issue of Isabel sometime Quene of England, Countesse of March, which she had by Hugh Brune Earle of March. These being wearie of tarrying in Placania, which the Frenchmen had taken, the king went out to mete them, promising them great gifts and possessions, which he after performed more largely then he promised.

The Lady Iane daughter of Gwarin de Moncheney was married to William de Valencia the kings brother on the mothers side, for the said Lady was hette to Gwaren, and was a rich marriage. And Alice daughter to the Earle of March the kings sister on the mothers side was married to Iohn earle Waren.

Subprior and Chanons, &c.

Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury in his visitation came to the Priorie of Saint Bartholomew in Smithfield, where being received with procession in most solemn wise, hee saide he passed not upon the honour, but came to visite them: vnto whome the Chanons answered, that they hauing a learned bishop, ought not in contempt of him to be visited by any other, which answered so much misliked the Archbishopspe, that hee forthwith fell on the Subprior, and smote him on the face with his fist, saying, Indéede, indéede, doeth it become you English traytors so to answer mee? Thus raging with others not to be recited, hee rent in pieces the rich coase of the Subprior, trode it vnder fete, and thrust him against a pillar of the Chancell, that hee had almost killed him, but the Chanons seeing, that their Subprior was almost dead, they ranne and plucked off the archbishop with such a violence, that they ouerthrew him backward, whereby they might see that he was armed and prepared to fight.

The archbishops men seeing their maister downe (being all strangers, and their maisters countriemen borne in Prouance) fell upon the Chanons, beat them, tare them, and trode them vnder their fete: at length the Chanons getting away as wel as they could, ranne bloody and myzie, rent and forne, to the bishop of London, to complaine, who bade them goe to the king at Westminster, and tell him thereof: whereupon foure of them went thither, the rest were not able they were so fore hurt: but when they came at Westminster, the king would neither heare nor see them, so they returned without redresse.

In the meane season the whole citie was in an uproare, and readie to haue rung the common bell, and to haue hewed the Archbishop into smal pieces, but he was secretly got away to Lambeth.

Sir Macy de Bescile, a French man, was by the king made Sherriffe and Constable of Glocester, wherewith the Barons beeing offended, they chose to bee Sherriffe, and placed there a knight of that countrey, called Sir William Tracy, which Sir William keeping Court vpon a daie in the Towne of Glocest. Macy the Frenchman, with a number of armed men came sodainly vpon him, dreynt him to the ground, and so to the castle, and cast him in prison, whereof when the Barons vnderstode, they sent Roger Clifford, and Sir Iohn Gifford with a great power to Glocester, who besieged the castle, bzent the bridge, and entred at the last, where they tooke the sayde Macy, with all his compaignie, and for that a Carpenter from the Castle with a quarrell, had slaine an Esquier of the Barons partie, Sir Iohn Gifforde made the same Carpenter to leape from the toppe of the castle, where through hee was cruellied to death. Sir Roger Clifford toke the keeping of the castle vpon him, and sent Macy into the March, Sir Iohn Gifford toke all Macies goods at Shereffstone, and elsewhere.

Peter de Egblanuch a Frenchman, Bysshoppe of Hereford, was drawne out of his Cathedral Church by Thomas Turberuill, and other, and sent to the Castle of Crdesley, where hee and Sir Macy were both committed to safe ward: his treasure was spoiled, and his Chanons sent to prison, and thus were Frenchmen serued through the lande where they might bee founde, by them that were on the Barons part.

Londoners getting them to the bridge in great numbers, under the which she must passe, cried out on her, vsing many vile reprochfull words, threwe durte and stones at her, that she was constrained to retorne again to the Towre. The citizens fortified the citie with yron chaines, & drawne ouerthwart their streets, munited the citie, and did maruellous things.

Peace concluded betwixt the king and his barons.

There was a peace concluded betwixt the king and the barons, with these conditions, that Henry, sonne to the king of Almaine, that toke the Barons part, and was in prison, shoulde bee deliuered, that all the kinges Castles throughth Englands shoulde bee put into the Barons handes, that the provisions of Wrotholme shoulde bee kept, and that all Straungers within a certaine time shoulde depart the lande, those except, whose abode the faithfull persons of the Realme with one assent shoulde accept: lastlie, that the Englishmen borne, and such as were faithfull men to the kingdome, shoulde order and rule the businesse of the Lande under the King. But this notwithstanding, certaine knights of the kings part fortified the Castle of Windsoze with victuals and armour. Edward the kinges sonne came to Wistowe, where discord rose betwixt his knights and the Townesmen, so that the Townesmen were minded to haue besieged the Castle: which when Edward understoode, hee sent for Walker Bysshoppe of Winchester that tooke the Barons part, that in his companie hee might goe to the Court of his father, promising to perswade his father to peace. Hereupon going forth with the Bysshoppe, till they came to Windsoze, hee entred the Castle, to the great misliking of the Bysshoppe: but Edward hostile returned, and went to meete Simon earle of Leicester, who with his adherentes were comming to besiege Windsoze Castell. Edward the kings sonne met with the saide Simon about Kingstone, and offered meanes of peace: but Simon trusting to Bysshoppe Walters counsell, deteyned Edward with him, and would not suffer him to departe till the Castell was yielded, they that were within, hauing libertie to depart whither they woulde: and the Straungers that minded to passe the Seas, had safe conducts graunted them. Lewlin prince of Wales confederate with earle Simon, in the meane time wasted the Countrey of Chester, and the marches of the same, and ouerthrew to the grounde the Castles of Diffard and Cannoke. After this, a Parliament was holden at London, in the which, many that had helde with the earle, went to the kinges part, as Henry of Almaine, Sonne to Richard king of Romanes, and other. The kings partie beeing encreased, hee went to Douer, and endeuored to haue gotten that castle out of the earles hands, but hee traualled in vaine.

King Henry kept his Christmas at London with the Q. the king of Almain and many other great estates.

Lewes king of France, through procuring of Boniface Archbysshop of Canterbury (who in politike Sermons at Paris, as well at the Friers preachers, as minozs, declared the doings betwixt the king of England, and the earle of Leicester) toke vpon him to make a peace betwixt them: whereupon the king of England, with his sonne Edward, and diuers other of the English nobilitie, came to Paris about the 22. of Iannarie, but the earle of Leicester, fearing the

the French kinges displeasure for his mothers sake, or some other cause not knowne, staid at home in England and proceeded in his businesse: wherefore Roger Mortimer beganne to deströie the possessions which the earle of Leicester held, against whom the prince of Wales went, and besieged the castle of Radnoze, and brought it to yeeld.

Edward the kings son, after his returne from Paris, about Lent, toke his journey toward the March, and passing by Oxford, the Burgeses shut vp the ir gates against him, whereby he was forced to lie at the kings Hall without the towne till the next morowe and then departed. The schollers of Oxforde being shut within the towne, brake vp the gate that leadeth toward Beaumont, for which dede the Maior sent some of them to prison: and not long after, while the schollers were at dinner, the Maior and Commons with banners displayed, thought to haue spoiled the Clerkes ere they had bene aware, but being espied, the schollers ran together, and with bowes and other weapons slew and wounded the Burgeses and Commons, brake vp manye houses, spoiling the goods, and set the houses of the Portuues (William Spicer and Geoffrey Hencley) on fire, on the Southside of the towne. Moreouer, because the Maior (Nicolas Kingstone) was a Mintener, they brake vp the Mintrie, brake the wines, and spoiled them, for the which fact the king caused the Clerks and schollers to be banished the Uniuersitie.

Edward the kings Sonne toke the Castle of Hare and Huntington, belonging to the earle of Hereford, and the Castle of Brecon being also rendered to him, he deliuered to Roger mortimer to keepe, with the territoie adiacent. Robert Ferrers earle of Darbie (who toke parte with earle Simon) besieged Worcester, and entering by the olde Castell, spoiled the Citizens of their goods, and compelled the Jewes to be chysened. The towne of Gloucester, that before was taken by the Barons, was now assailed by Edward the kings sonne, who entered the castle by great force, and in the next morning by meanes of the Bishoppe of Worcester, and Reignolde Abbot of Gloucester, a truce was taken betwixt the Barons in the towne, and the kings sonne in the Castle: but shortly after the Barons fled, and the Burgeses submitting themselves, were some of them hanged, the residue cast in prison, grievouslie ransomed, and the towne destroyed, from whence the kinges sonne departed, spoiling and wasting the countrey (contrarie to his othe made to the Barons) till he came to Oxforde, where he lodged in the house of the Frier preachers, and loined his power with the king his father, who was lately come thither to make his offering to Saint Friswide, (not fearing the superstitious opinion, that if any king entered that towne, the birgin there would be auenged on him.) The king hauing now with him his brother Richard king of Almaine, his sonne Edward, William de Valence his brother on the mothers side, and Iohn Cumyn of Scotlande, with a multitude of Scottisshmen, Iohn de Bailliol Lord of Galloway, Robert le Bruse Lord of Anandale, Roger de Clifford, Philip de Marmion, Iohn de Vallibus, Roger de Laborne, Henry Percy, Philip Basset, Roger de Mortimer, with an armie went and besieged Northampton, and the fourth of Aprill breaking the wal, toke the towne, and in it xv. knights bearing banners, Simon Mountfort the and went backe to meete him: but the king turning his wale from London toke the castle of Kenington or Kingston, which was the Carle of Glocesters, and then going to Rochester, chased away some that remained at the siege, but slew many mo: from thence he went to Tonbridge, the castle whereof he toke, and the Countesse of Glocester within it: leauing a garrison there, he went to Winchester, where he receiued them of the 5. ports to his peace, and passing further to Lewis, was receiued into the priory, and his son into the castle, where whiles he remained, the barons wrot to him letters, as ye may read in Mathew Paris, and Nicholas Triuet: but they taking no effect, the Barons in armes ap-proched towards Lewis, inuading the kings people that were gone forth for rage, whereof the king being warned, he goeth forth to meete them with his armie deuised into three sortes: The first was led by Edw. the kings sonne, hauing with him William de Valence Carle of Pembroke, and Iohn de Waren earle of Surrey and Sussex. The second was guided by Richard B. of Almaine with his sonne Henry. The third the K. himselfe had in gouerning. The Barons army was deuised into 4. wards. The first ledde Henry de Mountfort with the earle of Hereford. The second ledde Gilbert de Clare with Iohn fitz Iohn, and William de Mountchance. The third in which the Londoners were, Nicholas the kings sonne with his battell brake on his enemies that hee made them to giue backe, of whom many were drowned.

The Londoners were put to flight, whom whilste the kings sonne pursued

William de Valence, Guy de Lusignan, the kings halfe brethren, Hugh Bigot with men of armes to the number of 400. habergeons got then the castle of Pembrey, and when many were slaine on either side, the Lord Edward riding about the towne, found his father in the priory.

In the meane time an assault being giuen to the Castle, which was valiantly defended, the Barons withdrew to the river: whereupon the Lord Edward being greatly incouraged, and hauing gathered his people about him, would haue made a new battell, so that the Barons sued for peace, which by the meanes of the Friers preachers and Priores, was brought to passe, that on the Friday following, the Lordes, Edward and Henry, for their Fathers, of England and Almaine kinges, deliuered themselves to Carle Simon, vpon hope of quietnesse and peace that might bee concluded. On the Saturday the king licenced them that were about him to depart to their houses, and wrot vnto them that were in Tonbyrdge Castle, that they should not molest the Barons, as they returned homewards: but they notwithstanding being in armes, when they heard that the Londoners which were fled from the battell were receiued into Croydon, they hastid thither, & sleying many of them got great spoiles. From thence they went to Wistot, where they remained till Edward the kings son was deliuered. There was slaine in the battell at Lewes, (which was fought on the 12. of May) about 4500. men. Between Simon of Leiceſter, and Gilbert of Gloceſter ſtrife aroſe, for that Simon not only kept the king and other as priſoners, but alſo tooke to himſelfe the reuenues of the kingdome, &c. which ſhould haue bene equally diuided amongſt them, ſo that Gilbert of Gloceſt. departing, ioined to him in league the noble knights of the marches, whome earle Simon had commanded to auoide the realme, but Ioh. de Waren Earle of Surrey and Suſſer, and William de Valence earle of Pembroke, had brought a great power by ſea in the Weſt parts of Wales, & arriving at Pembroke, earle Simon leading the king with him, went to Hereford, where he gathered a great power, to oppreſſe the ſaid knights: but while the prelates laboured for peace, Edward the kings ſonne being in the caſtle of Hereford is permitted to exerciſe himſelfe on horſebacke in a meadow without the city by his keepers, where after he had wearied himſelfe, and mounting on a freſh appointed for that purpoſe, he rode quite awaie, and paſſing the riuer of Welſy, with two knights and foure Eſquires, was followed harde by his keepers: but when they were aduiſed of the Standarts of Rog. Mortimer and Roger Clifford comming to his reliefe, they returned, and he eſcaped to Wigmore. And this chanced in the Whitſon weeke, Lord Edward being thus eſcaped, gathereth an army, confederateth and ſubmitteth to him the Countreies of Hereford, Worceſter, Salop, and Cheſter, with the towneſ, citieſ and caſtles, he alſo winneth by force the citie of Gloceſter, whiche Earle Simon had lately fortified, the towneſmen fled to the caſtle, who 15. daies after yielded it, and departed. The earle of Leiceſter wan the Caſtle of Monmouth, and laiſe it flat with the ground, and entring into the land of the earle of Gloceſter called Glamorgan, meeting with the prince of Wales comming to his aide, they deſtroyed all with fire and ſword.

Edward the kings ſonne hearing that manie of Earle Simons partakers were come to the Caſtle of Kenilworth, taking with him the Earle of Gloceſter, hee departed from Worceſter, and came vpon them at a ſodaine, where hee tooke the Earle of Oxforde, Sir William Mountchaſſe, Sir Adam Newmarch, Sir Walter de Solenle and other: and Simon the ſonne of Earle Simon hardly eſcaped in the Caſtle. The earle of Leiceſter hauing the king with him, returned out of South Wales, and on Lammas day came to Kemſey a place of the Biſhop of Worceſter, and there tarried the next day, Edward the kings ſonne returned from Kenilworth to Worceſter, whoſe returne being knowne, Earle Simon departing from Kemſey, by unhappy chance ſtaied in the towne of Queſham, for on the morrow being the 2. of Auguſt, Edward the kings ſonne departed from Worceſter, paſſing the riuer nere to the towne called Clue, cloſed by the paſſage betwixt earle Simon and Simon his ſonne, who was at Kil-lingworth. In the next morning L. Edward approached nere to Queſham on the one ſide, & Gilbert earle of Gloceſt. on the other ſide, and Roger Mortimer on the two other ſides, wherby earle Simon was ſo enclosed, that he muſt either fight or yeelde: on Fridaie therefore the ſixt day of Auguſt, their armies encountered each other in a large fielde without the towne, where the Carles part Lordes taken at Cuesham, sir Vmfrey de Boune, sir Iohn Saint Iohn, sir Simons son, sir Guy, sir Baudwyn Wake, sir Iohn Vessy, sir Henry Hastings, sir Nicol. Segraue, sir Perce and sir Robert, Mountforts sons, and many other, Simon de Mountfort the sonne coming too late to mete his father at Cuesham, turned backe againe to Kenilworth Castle, and the sixt of September he released the king of Almaine, his mothers brother, sir Reimond Fitz Pierce, and many other.

Simon Montfort being slaine, his fauourers toke the Castle of Warwike, beat downe the walls, toke William Manduir, and Alice his Countesse, and sent them prisoners to Kenilworth Castle, where they remained till they had payde 1900. markes.

A parliament was holden at Winchest. where all the statutes made at Oxford were disanulled, and al the goods of them that were against the king seised. London was in great danger to haue bene destroyed by the king, for displeasure he had conceiued against the Citizens, but the Citizens wholly submitted both liues and goods vnto him. Eight persons carrying the same submission toward Windsor, met sir Roger Leyborn knight at Colbrooke, who turned them backe againe, and after they had discoursed the whole matter with him, he willed them to deliuer to him their submission, and he woulde moue the king in it, which thing they did. After sixe daies this knight returned to the Citie, and said the king had receiued their writings, willing them first to take away all the chaines that were in the streets of the Citie, & pul the postes out of the ground that the same were fixed in, and bring both chaines and postes to the Tower of London: then the Mayor with fortye Citizens should the next day following attend vpon the king at Windsor to confirme their writing, and they should go and come safe: in witness whereof he deliuered them the kings letter and seale, for the space of foure daies. The next day the Citizens being at Windsor, attended at the gate untill the king came from hunting, at which time he woulde not once looke on them. After the king was entred, they would haue followed, but they were forbidden: shortly after they were called into the Castle, where they were locked vp in a Tower with homely entertainment: the next daie the king came vnto prince Edward the Mayor and foure Aldermen, the rest were committed to seuerall prisons.

The Countesse of Leicester, wife to Simon Mountfort, yelded the castle of Demsey to king Henry her brother, who shortly banished her the Realme of England for ever. About Alhalowtide the Quene of England returned from beyond the seas, with her came the Legate, named Othobone, who shortly after his comming, in counsell holden at Northampton, accused al the bishops and priests that had ayded earle Simon against the king, especiallie hee cursed by name, Walter of Worcester, Henry of London, and Stephen of Chichester, and the Bishop of Lincoln. Worcester shortly after deceased, the other three went to Rome, and were assolied. The Legate also published the popes Bul, for the tenthes of Churches to be paid to the king for the next yere. Sir Simon the ponger fled from Kenilworth castle to the disherited knightes, who then were in the Isle of Orholme, where he remained not long, for through messengers with false promises, and hostages given by Edw. the kings son, hee forsa- king them went to London to the king and his nobility, but being pryly warned of their guile, he made an escape and got ouer into France.

the Castle of all things necessary. King Henry halting thither, began his siege the morrow after Epiphommer day, which siege continued till Christmas after, for they within the Castle, not fearing his force which was great, sette open their gates, and neuer closed them daie nor night, come who so woulde they came to their cost, so that manie a man was slaine on both sides, and manie were taken and ransomed. At length the Legate, the Archbyschoppe, and two other Byschoppes, came to make accorde betwene the king and the disherited, and also them of the Castle: but the disherites, nor they of the Castle woulde graunt to the kings will, wherefore the Legate accursed them, and all that were of their accord: but they of the Castle, not regarding the Legate nor his cursing, in mockage thereof, clothed a prest their surgeon, Philippe Porpeis, in a coape of white, and setting him on the castle wall, as a white Legate against the red, made him to accurse the king, the Legate, and all their partakers. Whiles this busines lasted at Kenilworth, the disherites toke the Isle of Ely, and strengthened it in such wise, that they held it long: they robbed Northfolke, Suffolke, and Cambridgeshire, they spoiled the city of Norwich, and ransomed the rich men at their pleasure. At Bartholmewide the King held a Parliament at Billington, wherein by his Barons were chosen six persons, which being sworn, chose to them other six, these six to make an accord betwene the king and the disherites: the first 6. were, Walter Gifford bishop of Bath, Nicolas of Ely, bishop of Worcester, and Walter bishop of Excester, Roger de Sumcrey, Robert Walronde, and Alaine de la Souch barons: these 6. chose to them Gilbert earle of Gloucester, Humfrey earle of Hereford, the bishop of S. Davids, sir Iohn Bailiol, sir Philip Basset, and sir Waren de Basingborn, if these six could not agree, the Legate, and Henry son to Richard king of Almain should be Arbiters, these met and agreed at the last.

By the kings commandement, the byshops, Abbots, Bysops, earles, barons, and knights of the realme were assembled at Northampton on the Tuesday next before Alhalowndate, there to vnderstand and confirme by statute what the forenamed twelve states had decreed for the state of the kingdome, which was for the barons, that none should be disherited, but the Countforts and the Fferers, the other should redeme their lands with money, at the hands of them who had the same in possession of the Kings gift, so that none paid above 7. yeres value, nor vnder 3. yeres value, which was the least, & this shalbe assessed according to the quantity of their trespassse. The siege of Kenilworth yet continuing, they within the castell began to be sore troubled with the fire, and also were without hope of succour to come to them, whereupon on S. Thos. day before Christmas they yielded the castle to the king with condition to depart with life and lims, without losse of goods, or imprisonment, and not to be disherited.

Edward did smite round peny, halfe peny, farthing,
 The crosse passes the bond of all throughout the ring.
 The Kings side was his head, and his name written,
 The crosse side, what citie it was in, coyned and smitten.
 To poore man, ne to priest, the peny frayes nothing,
 Men giue God aye the least, they feast him with a farthing.
 A thousand two hundred, fourescore yeres and mo,
 On this money men wondred, when it first began to go.

The olde money was not so; bidden to goe with the newe : and besides these moneys, there was coyned groates, containing foure pence the pæce.

The pound of esterling money at this time contained 12. ounces, to witte, fine silver (such as men make into foyle or leaues, and is commonly called silver of Gutherom lane) 11. ounces, 2. esterlings, and one sterling, and the other 17. d. ob. q.; to be alay. Also the pound ought to wey of money, 20. s. 3. d. by account, so that no pound ought to be aboue 20. s. 4. d. nor lesse then 20. s. 2. d. by account. The ounce to wey 20. d. The peny to wey 24. graines, &c.

This pæce was inclosed the first great Parsh at Plumsted by the Abbot of Delsnese: the other part of the same Parsh was inclosed foureteene yeres after in the pæce 1293.

Robert Burnell Bish. of Bath and Welles the kings Chancelor; dedicated that church, and that day the carle laide the foundation of the new church of North Diney.

King Edward celebrated the feast of Christmas at S. Edmundsbury.

David Lord of Denbigh being reconciled to his brother the Prince Leoline (against whom he had bin a traitor) vpon condition he should neuer after serue the king of England, but become his bitter enemy, laide siege to the Castle of Haywarden and toke therein Sir Roger Clifford (a noble knight) slaying all that that resisted, and after spoiling all the Countrey, he with his brother the prince laide siege to the castle of Ruthland. The king hearing this, hastid thither with a great army to raise the siege, and in his toyn he celebrated the feast of Easter at the Wife in the Diocesse of Salisburie, from thence he went to Ambzelsbery, there to visite his mother, who remayned in that Monasterie. Which being done, he hastid after his army into Wales, whose coming being heard of, the Prince retired with his army. But in the meane time Ryce the sonne of Malgon, and Griffyth ap Meridith ap Owen, with other noblemen of Southwales, took the castle of Aberistwith, the castle of Flint, of Rutland, and diuers other, spoiling the kings people that inhabited the reaboutes. Whereupon John Peckham Archbyschop of Canterburie, after hee had visited his whole prouince, considering the great warres betwene the king and Lewline, he traualled for the appeasing thereof, first to the king being at Ruthland, then to the prince being at Snowdon: which his whole traualle therein, with the griefe, and causes of those wars he particularly set down word by word in the said archbishops records: all which I receiued at the hands of Doctor Yale, when he was Deane of the Arches, as I haue set downe in my larger Chronicle.

King Edward kept his feast of Christmas at Worcester. From this Christmas till the Purification of our Ladie, there was such a frost and snow, as no man liuing coulde remember the like, where-through, five arches of London bridge, & all Rochester bridge were boyn down, & carried away with the stream, and the like happened to many bridges in England. And not long after men passed ouer the Thames betwene Westminster and Lambeth, and likewise ouer the river of Medway, betwene Stronde and Rochester dyke. Fishes in ponds, and birds in woods died for want of food.

For the Welchmen having experience of the government of the English officers, and knowing that the king would rule the country by his deputies, could not abide to haue any Englishman to be their ruler: wherefore oftentimes, vpon the kings motion they answered, that they were contented to take for their Prince any man, whom he would name, so that he were a Welchman, and other answer could he neuer get of them by any meanes. Whereupon, having secretly sent for the Q. being then great with childe, caused her to remaine at Carnarvon: and when she was nigh her time of deliuerance, the king being at Ruthin, sent for all the Barons and best men of Wales, to come to him to consult concerning the weale publike of their country; and when they were come, he deferred the consultation, untill hee were certified that the Quene were deliuered of a sonne: Then sending certaine Lordes to the christening, hee called the Welchmen together, declaring vnto them, that whereas they were oftentimes suiters vnto him to appoint them a Prince; he now having occasion to depart out of the country would name them a prince, if they would allow and obey him whom he should name. To the which they answered, that they would so do, if he would appoint one of their nation. Whereunto the king replied, that he would name one that was borne in Wales, and could speake neuer a word of English, whose life and conversation no man was able to detect. And when they all had granted, that such a one they would obey, he named his owne son Edward borne in Carnarvon Castle a fewe daies before. Parliament at Stepenheath.

Humfrey de Boune earle of Hereford deceased, and was buried at Malden. Also John Gifford deceased.

In the beginning of Lent king Edward held a parliament at Stepenheath by London, in the house of Henry Walleis, then Mayor of London, where being being requested by the earles and barons, that he would confirme the charter of liberties, according to that he had promised in Scotland, after certaine delays, he agreed to their instance, with this addition: The right of our Crowne saved: which words of addition the earles liked not, and therefore departed. But being sent for againe, about the Dintdene of Easter, all things were granted to them at their desire. Whereupon the perambulation of forrests through England was committed unto 3. bishops, 3. earles, and 4. barons, that they might see the execution of iustice done.

This yere was made an act of common counsell for prices of victualles to be sold at London, by consent of the king and nobilitie, concerning the price of poultrie. A fatte Cocke for thre halfe pence, two pullets for thre halfe pence, a fatte Capon for two pence halfe pence, a Goose four pence, a Mallard thre halfe pence, a Partridge for tze halfe pence, a Pasant four pence, a Heron six pence, a Plouer one pennie, a Swanne for thre shillings, a Crane for twelve pence, two Woodcockes for thre halfe pence, a fat Lambe from Christmasse to Shrouetide sixtene pence, and all the whole yere after for four pence.

A sodaine fire inclosed the monasterie of Gloucester; the cloister, belfrey, the great chamber, with other buildings was consumed.

For the establishment of the peace betwene England and France, on the 10. of September, king Edw. took to wife Margaret, sister to Philip le Bewe then king of France: they were married at Canterburie, and the feast was kept there in the great hall of the bishops palace. The king imprisoned his son Edward, because that Walter Langton Bishop of Chester had complained, that the foresaid Edward through counsell of Pierce of Gavestone, a squire of Gascoigne, had broken his parks, and that Edward was led and governed by the foresaid Pierce, wherefore the king did exile the said Pierce for evermore.

Henry Newarke Archbyschop of Yorke deceased, and was buried at Yorke, Thomas Corbridge succeeded him in the Archbyschopricke.

Oliuer Sutton bishop of Lincolne also deceased, unto whome succeeded John de Adarley Chancellor of the same church.

King Edward commaunded that all the manacles and chaines of yron that might be found within the whole Realme, to an inestimable multitude, should be brought into the Tower of London, the cause whereof was utterlie unknowne to his subjects.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Berwiche, and the Quene at Windsor, within the solemnitie of which feast, to wit, upon Saint Stephens day, king Edward made diuers false moneyes, as Crohardes, Dollardes, Rosaries, and others, coined in partes beyond the seas, and uttered here for sterlinges, so that manie thereby were deceiued. These moneyes the king at the first commaunded to be currant for halfe pence, which was but halfe the value they were coined for: but on Easter euen next following, the same moneyes were forbidden throughout all England, and after called in, and new sterling money coined unto his great aduantage. This sterling money was so called of the Easterlings that were the first coiners of siluer of that fineness in England.

King Edward kept his Christmasse at London.

Robert Bruce an Englishman, presuming by the right of his wife to usurpe the kingdome of Scotlande, called a Parliament of the Nobles of Scotland within the Church of the Friers Spinors in Domfries, where hee selve John Comin, because he would not agree to the treason, and shortly after, to witte, in the feast of the Annunciation of our Lady, in the Abbey of Scone, he caused himselfe to be solemnly crowned king by the Bishops of Glasco, and Saint Andrewes first, and the thirde day after by the Countesse of Bolwan, because her brother the Earle of Fife to whome by right of inheritance that office belonged, was then absent in England.

In the feast of Pentecost king Edward honored his eldest sonne, Edward of Carnarvan with the degree of knighthood, and with him also moe then a hundred noble young men, at Westminster.

Trayle Baston.

About the feast of the Nativity of our Lady, the K. went againe into Scotland, with a great armie, having sent his sonne Edward with Aymer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Robert Clifford, Henry Lacy, and many other noble knightes and Gentlemen, at Whitson tide before, also he sent before him his iudices of Trayle Baston, two and two together into euery city and place into which he would come, giuing them power to kill traytors, and hang perjured perjured persons, burne such as woꝝke deceite, destroy the wicked and sette Englishmen in their places, and there were taken by them in the space of two moneths by inquisition of Juries, hundreds and thousands, breakers of peace and conspiratours, amongst the which Nigellus de Bruse, brother to Robert de Bruse, was drawne through Berwikke and hanged: moreover Christopher and John Seyton brethren were hanged: the Countesse of Bolwan was closed in a Cage, whose breadth, length, height, and depth, was eight fote, and hanged ouer the wals of Berwikke: the Bishop of S. Andrews and of Glasco, with the Abbot of Scone, were sent to severall prisons in England.

King Edward besieged Simon Frisell in Lylpscho, and toke him and sent him to London Towre, where he found many Scottissh Lords in fetters of prison, amongst whom was Thomas Morham with Herbert his son, and Thomas Roys his Esquier, who were all beheaded: Simon Frisell was hanged, drawne and quartered: Carle Iohn de Achol because he was of the kings blood and an Englishman, was not drawne, but hanged and headed: Sir Ioh. Wallers was sent to the Tower of London and after hanged and headed: Laurence de Megos Esquire was taken at Douer and there beheaded. The earle of Stratherne yielded to king Edward, who condemned him to remaine during his life in prison fetters in the Castle of Rochester.

At this time, and long after, king Edward had Scotland in such good obedience, as he gaue of the landes thereof to his seruants and subiectes in England, with Markets, Fayres, and Warens: amongst others I haue seene vnder the boade seale of the said king Edward a mannor called Kernes in the Countie of Fferface, in Scotland, and nere the furthest part of the same nation Northward, giuen to Iohn Eure and his helres, ancestor to the Lord Eure that now is, for his seruice done in those partes, with market euery Sunday, fayre for thre daies euery yere, at the feast of Saint Michael, and free Warren for the same, dated at Lauercoft the 20. day of October, Ann. reg. 34.

This yere Margaret Quene, second wife to Edward the first, began to build the Quire of the church of the Gray Friers in London, to the building whereof in her life she gaue two thousand markes, and an hundred markes by her Testament: Iohn of Byptaine Earle of Richmond builded the body of the Church: Lady Mary Countesse of Pembroke, Gilbert Clare Earle of Glocestre, Margaret Countesse, Lady Elianor le Spencer, & Lady Elizabeth de Brugh sisters to Gilbert de Clare, gaue great sums of money towarde the same: Richard Whittington, sometime Alderman and Mayor of London founded the Library there, in anno 1421.

King Edward helde his Christmasse at Carlile, with a great multitude of English people, and in the moneth of January next following, he called a great Parliament to be holden at Carlile vpon the Decaues of S. In this parliament many complaints were made of the oppression of churches and Monasteries, by the Popes Chaplaine named William Testa Archdeacon of Araine in the Church of Conuentrie. The same Clarke was forbidden to vse anie more such extortions, and diuers Statutes were ordained touching religious persons which had their principall houses in other realmes.

There came to this Parliament, sent from the Pope, a Cardinall called Petrus Hispanus, to treat of a marriage betwixt Edward Prince of Wales, and the French kings daughter.

The course of

St. Walsingham.

And amongst many other suites made there, Henry Lacy Earle of Lincoln complained, that whereas in times past, the course of water running at London vnder Holborne bridge, and Fleete bridge into the Thamis, had bene of such large breadth and depth, that ten or twelue ships at once with merchandises were wont to come to the foresaide bridge of Fleete, and some of them to Holborne bridge: nowe the same course (by filth of the Tanners and such other) was soze decayed. Also by rapling by of wharffes, but especially by turning of the water, which they of the newe Temple made to their milles with out Baynards Castle, and diuers other perturbations, the saide shippes nowe could not enter as they were wont, and as they ought, wherefore he desired, that the Mayor of London with the Sheriffes, and certaine discrete Aldermen might be appointed to see the course of the said water, and that by oth of honest men all the foresaid hindrances might be remoued, and to be made as it was wont of old time, &c. Which was answered and recorded, that Roger le Brazon, the constable of the tower, with the Mayor and Sheriffes are assigned, that taking with them other honest and discret men, they make diligent search and inquirie, how the said riuer was in olde time, and that they leaue nothing that make hurt or stoppe it: and to keepe it in the same state that it was wont to bee.

King Edward remaining all the winter and summer at Carlisle, disposed manie things of Scotland at his pleasure: but in the meane time Robert le Bruce going about the Countrey, slew manie that would not obey him, and he sent with part of his army two of his brethren, Thomas that was a knight, and Alexander a priest, Deane of Glasco, into another part of the Countrey, that they might allure the people vnto them by gentle perswasions, which (by comming of Englishmen vpon them) were taken, ledde to the Iustices, condemned, hanged and headed at Carlisle.

Ioane of Acres Countesse of Gloucester deceased.

King Edward sent messengers into England, commanding all that ought him seruice to bee ready at Carlisle, within three weekes after the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist: but himselfe being vexed with the bloudie fire, hee sent vnto his sonne that hee shoulde come with speede to heare his last wordes, whome, among other things hee did counsell to bee mercifull, iust, and constant in all his wordes and dedes: hee commaunded him not to bee too hastie to take vpon him the Crowne of England, vntill he had reuenged the injuries done by the Scottes, but rather to stae in those partes, and

to cause his fathers bones (being closed in a chest) to be bozne about with him, till he had gone thoroze all Scotland and ouercome his aduersaries. He also commaunded him to honour his mother, and loue his two bryethen, Thomas earle Marthall, and Edmund Earle of Kent. Whoeuer he charged him on his curse, that he should not presume to call home Pierce of Gaueston, by common decre banished without common fauour: he declared to him also, that he had taken on him the crosse, for the seruice in the holy lande, to the which he had determined to haue gone in person, but troubled with the new and diuers attemples of Robert le Bruse, he was hindered of his purpose, and was constrained, omitting that businesse, to turne the warre into Scotland. 32000. pound of siluer (saith he) I haue prepared for the charges of an hundred knights to go honozably thither with their retinnes: because it is not my happe to perfozme in proper person, what I had intended, let them yet take my heart, and carrie thither, which if they doe, I trust in my God that all things shall prosper with them. I therefore (saith he) doe streightly command the in paine of my curse, that am thy ffather, that the said money be not otherwisse spent.

The king also called vnto him Henry Lacy earle of Lincolne, Guy Earle of Warwike, Aymer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, and Robert Clifford Baron, desiring them to be good to his son, and that they should not suffer Pierce of Gaueston to come again into England, to set his sonne in riot, and the seuenth of July he departed this life at Wigh upon the sands, in the yere 1307. when he had reigned 34. yeres, 7. moneths, and odde daies, and was 68. yeres of age. He was buried at Westminster.

He had issue by his first wife Elianor, daughter to the king of Spaine, five sonnes, to wit, Henry, John, and Alfonse that died without issue, Edward that succeeded him in the kingdome, and Henry that died without issue, and tenne daughters, to wit, Elianor Countesse of Barre, Ioane of Acres Countesse of Glocest. Julian that died yong, Margaret Dutchesse of Brabant, Alice that died yong, Elizabeth Countesse of Hereford, Elizabeth Countesse of Holland, Mary that was a Nunne at Ambresbury, Beatrice that died yong, Blanch that died yong: he had issue by Margaret daughter to Philip king of France his second wife, two sons, to wit, Thomas of Wotherton, and Edmond of Woodstocke Earle of Kent, and one daughter, named Elianor that died yong.

The king gaue vnto Pierce of Caueson all such gifts and jewels as had bin giuen to him, with the crownes of his father, his ancessors treasure, and manie other things, affirming that if he could, he should succeed him in the kingdome, calling him Brother, not granting any thing without his consent. The Lords therefore enuying him, told the king, that the father of this Pierce was a traitour to the king of France, and was for the same executed, and that his mother was burned for a witch, and that the saide Pierce was banished for consenting to his mothers witchcraft, and that hee had now bewitched the king himselfe. They besought the king to heare therefore their petitions, which should be both for his owne honor, and for the wealth of his people.

First, that hee would confirm and vse such ancient Lawes and customes,

as are contayned in the Charters of the kings his Predecessors: and for that they woulde graunt him the twentieth part of their goods, and bee his true subiectes.

Secondlie, that he woulde take nothing of anie man, but at the price of the owner, the same to be paid for to the bittermost. 2

Thirdlie, that whatsoener was alienated from the crowne, since his fathers death, might be restored thereunto againe. 3

Fourthlie, that hee woulde obserue the oathe hee made before his father, as of the renouing of Peter Gauenston, the prosecuting of the Scottis warre, and that all that was amisse shoulde bee amended, least his enemies reioice at it, &c. 4

That Justice and Iudgement mighte bee done in the Lande, as well to the Rich, as to the Poore, according to the aunctent and olde approued Lawes and Customes of Englande, and that no man shoulde bee restrayned by the kings Witte from prosecuting his Right, or to defende himselfe by Lawe. 5

Then the king taking counsell of Pierce, Hugh Spencer the Treasurer, the Chancellour and others, hee appoynted to answer the Barons at the parliament on Hordale. The barons being departed out of London, the city gates were shutte vp and chained, greate watch kept, and Hugh Spencer made Constable of London. The King with Peter of Gauenston went toward Wallingford Castle with a great companie of souldiers, as well strangers as English, and Hugh Spencer tarried still at London. The Parliament on Hordale was kept, the king and Barons being there when they decreed that the same Pierce should be banished the land to depart on the morrowe after Midsummer date, neuer to returne againe. The king gaue him two and thirtie Townes, and so manie castles in Gascoigne, and great summes of money out of his earle dome of Cornetwall during his life: The king accompanied him to Bristow, sent him into Ireland, assigning him the whole gouernement and reuenues of that countrey.

The king sent for Pierce of Gaueston out of Ireland: he landed at Carnarvon, on the euen of S. Iohn Baptist, the king mette him at the Castle of Flint with great ioy: and gaue to him the earle of Gloucesters sister in marriage, they were married at Barkhamsted, which caused him again to rise in pride, scorning the nobles of the Realme, and to abuse the king, as befoze he had done, in conueying the treasure of the realme into foraine countries, amongst the which treasure, he conueied the table and tressles of gold from the treasure of Westminister, and deliuered them to one Armery of Frisconband to be conueied into Gascoigne. The barons therefore declared to the king, that except he would expel the said Pierce from his company, they would rise against him as against a perjured Prince: whereupon by the aduise of Pierce of Gaueston, the king sent for aide into Gascoigne, to the earle of Foy, and the Viscount of Penoy, and they came with three hundred horsemen through Fraunce, but Philippe the French king imprisoned the chiefe, and slewe and hanged the other. Also, the king of England had word from Robert Bruce of Scotland, and from Robert Fitz Thomas of Ireland, that they would not take part with the king against his Barons, whereupon the king being wroth, fortified Windsoz castle, and began to build towres and other strange things.

The Abbot of Saint Denis in France, being sent Legate from the Pope, to demand the Legacie that king Edwards father gaue to the holie Lande, did earnestlie request king Edwards to remoue from him Peter Gaueston, with whose conuersation all the worlde was as it were infected. Then the king appointed a Parliament at Northampton, determining from thence to passe into Scotland: the Barons came to this parliament well furnished, but the king sent them worde hee would not come there, yet at the last he came to Stonie Stratford, whither were sent to him by the Barons, the earles of Warwicke and Clare, who requested him to come for his owne profite, and the commoditie of the Realme: at length he went in the habite of a squire, and the Barons met him without armor, and in the end they louingly embraced and were made friends, and the voyage to Scotland was returned till another time. After Michaelmas, the Parliament was holden at London, unto the which Parliament came Lewes the French kings brother, with the Bysshoppe of Baytowe, from the king of France, to intreat vnitie betwixt the king and his lordes: and there were diuers god ordinaunces made. And once againe, though sore against the kings mind, he caused Pierce to abiure, with condition added by the barons, that if he were found again in any land subiect to the kings dominion, he should be taken as a common enemy, and condemned. This being done, he passed into Flanders, and from thence to other countries, seeking rest, which hee could not find.

The seconde daie of September at night, an horrible Tempest of Thunder happened, so that hedges and trees lost their greenesse, and the Church of Middleton in Dorsetshire, with the Steple, Belles, Dynaments, and all other monuments monuments of that place, were consumed with the lightning, the Monks being at Mottins.

Henry Lacy earle of Lincolne, Constable of Chester, and Custos of Englande, died at London, in his house called Lincolnes Inne, in Holborne: hee was buried in the new Church (whereof he was founder) of S. Pauls Church, betwixt our Ladies Chappell, and S. Dunstons Chappell, where a faire monument of stone was rayled for him, with his picture in armour crosse legged, as a Templar bolued for the defence of the holie land, and Citie of Ierusalem.

A Prorinciall Councell was holden at London against the Templars in England, vpon heresie & other articles, whereof they were accused, who denied the fact, sauing one or two of them: notwithstanding all did confesse, that they coulde not purge themselves, and therefore were condemned to perpetual penance in severall monasteries, where they behaved themselves verie well.

At Paris in France 54. of the Templars were bent, by the iudgement of Philip the French king.

Pierce of Ganeffon conceiving an affiance in the favour of king Edward, and of the yong earle of Glocester, whose sister he had married, taking with him many strangers, returned into England, and a little before Christmas came to the kings presence, whom the king, forgetting all oathes and promised pacts, received as a heauenlie gift.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Pothe, where Pierce of Ganeffon was present with his Outlandish men, the king reioicing, and beeing in a greate tollitie because he had received him in safetie, all the court and Quene being sorrowfull, because they sawe the king not verie sounde. The mightie men of the land therefore sought howe they might set an ende to the trouble at hande, for they feared to raise warre, and durst not disquiet the king, yet the perill being twised, they founde that so long as Pierce lived, there coulde be no peace in the kingdome, nor the king to abound in treasure, nor the Quene to enjoy the kinges true love. Thus after they had long considered the perilles past, present, and to come, they determined rather to trise all extremities, then to be despised and set at naught by a stranger, they chose a captaine then for their busines to come, Thomas of Lancaster, noble in lineage, valiant in armes, excellent in fame for his maners and iustice, he was son to Edmund earle of Lancaster, and therefore by inheritance earle of Lancaster, Leicester and Ferrers. In proces of time he married the only daughter of the earle of Lincoln, to wit, Henrie Lacyes daughter, whereupon after the earles decease, of a great man, he was made a greater, for he was earle of Lincoln, and of Salisbury, besides the liberties of Pickering, and the honoz of Cockermoze, and other great lands in Wales, and the earledome of Artoys in France.

The king shortly after gave the castle of Somerton to Henry Beaumont. The castle of Ainelwike which William de Vesey had given unto him by the said Bishop, trusting in him, that he would preserve it to the use of the bishops young bastard, and deliver it to him when he came to mans estate, he took money therefore, and sold it to Henry Percy, he had the Isle of man during his life by the kings graunt, Kellow was elect Bishop of Durham.

King Edward with Peter Gausston his companion, went to Poike, where the king was lodged in the pallace of the Archbishop, and Peter in the Castle: they caused the Citie to be fortified, and the walles to be repayed, and sent to Robert Bailliol of Scotland for aide against his Lordes; but Robert made answer, he would not forsoth of Scotland, neither would he disquiet any man: the like answer was made by the Welchmen. Robert de Bruse got againe almost all Scotland, the Castles with munitions (the English Garrisons beeing cast out) he tooke againe into his power. This yere therefore by consent of the Prelates, and certaine Nobles, Hugh Spencer the sonne was appointed the Kings Chamberlaine in place of Peter of Guesclon, whom they the rather preferred, because they knew the King hated him: neuertheless, not long after, by his great diligence, he brought himselfe into the kings fauour. The father of this Hugh being old, was yet liuing, a knight of great vertue, in counsell wise, in armes valiaunt, whose confusion and shamefull end he tooke vnto himselfe by natural loue though disorderly towards his sonne, who was in bodie vertie comely, in spirite proude, and in action most wicked, whose couetousnes and ambition, by the disheriting of Widowes and Strangers, wrought the death of the Nobles, the fall of the king, with the bitter destruction of himselfe and his father.

King Edward gathering a great power, marched towardes Scotland, to breake the Siege of Striuelling Castle, and lodged himselfe and his people there about in the felde on the euen of S. Iohn Baptist: neuer afore that time was seene the like preparation, pride and cost in the time of warre, as affirmeth Robert Paston, a Carmelite Friar, being present, and taken of the Scots, which he sorrowfully bewayled in his Heroycall Verse whiles he was prisoner. The first night (saith hee) ye might haue seene the Englishmen bathing themselves in Wine, and casting their gorges: there was crying, shouting, wastaling, and drinking, with other rioting farre aboue measure. On the other side, ye might haue seene the Scottes quiet still, and close, fasting the euen of Saint Iohn Baptist, labouring in loue of the libertie of their Countrey. On the morrowe, the Scottes hauing gotten the most conuenient place in the felde for victorie, made ditches in the grounde three fote deepe, and the like in breadth, from the right wing of the army, vnto the left, couering the same with weake twiggess or Herdes, and againe ouer with the Turfe and grasse, which was not of strength to beare horsemen. The army of the Scottes being deuised into certaine troupes, stode not farre off from this dike, which was betwixt them and the Englishmen. On the other side, the army of the Englishmen comming out of the West, the sunne rising, casting his beames on their golden Targets, bright helmets, and other armour, gaue such a refection, as was both wonderfull and terrible to beholde. In the first warde were the light horsemen, and heauie coursers. In the second were the Archers, and other footemen, who were appointed for the chase of the aduersaries. In the third was the king with his Bishoppes, and other Religious, amongst whome was Hugh Spencer. The horsemen of the first front making vppon their enemies, soundered with their fore feete into the ditch, and lay there tumbling, abiding the cruelty of the Scots, who comming vpon them, slew some, and tooke a great manie rich men for raunsome. There was aaine Gilbert de Clare Earle of Gloucester, (whome the Scottes would gladly haue kept for raunsome, if they had knowne him, but he had forgotten to put on his coate of armes:) with him was aaine Sir Edmond Manly, Sir Robert Clifford, Sir Paine

Almost three hundred men of armes were slaine in that place, our Archers killing manie of them, who seeing the Scottes cruellie bent vpon our Hospitall men fallen in the Ditch, shotte their Arrowes with a high compasse, that they might fall betwixt the armour of their Enemies, which was all in wayne: and when they shotte righte forth, they slawe fewe of the Scottes, by reason of their armed bycass, but manie of the Englishmen, by reason of their naked backs.

R. Edward kept his Christmas at Beverley with many prelates, lords, and barons, at which time he provided himselfe of a great army, that he might bring down the pride of the Scots, if by any means it were for him profitable, and to deliver England from their eruptions.

Berwike betrayed.

About Midlent the towne of Berwike was betrayed to the Scots, through the treason of Peter Spalding, and other Englishmen, whome the king of Scots caused to be hanged for being traitors to their countrie. The castle held out, till for want of victuals they within were constrained to deliver it into the Scottishmens hands, who wan also at the same time, the castles of Harbottle, Mark, and Midford, so that they possessed the more part of all Northumberland, even to Newcastle upon Tyne, saving certaine castles that were defended against them.

The Scots invaded England Rich South, L. Trecklow.

In May they entred further into the land, burning all before them, till they came to Ripon, which towne they spoiled, and carrying thre daies, they received 1000. marks of those that were got into the church, because they should not put the towne to the fire, as they had done the townes of Rothallerton, and Boroughbidge, &c.

In their returning backe, they burnt Knaresburgh, and Skipton in Craven, and also other afoze them, carrying into Scotland a marvellous multitude of cattell, besides prisoners men and women.

The Northshiresmen gathered together, to the number of 10000. mette with the Scots at the towne of Pitton, tenne miles by Northweast from Yorke, where they lost 3000. men, and were overcome by the Scots. Which when the king heard tel of, he left the siege of Berwick, and hasted to meet the Scots, but they returned another waie.

The Pope ordained, that Parsons should have but one benefice a peece: whereupon patrons straight presented new parsons to the residue.

The king being at Yorke, the Scots entred England, came to Yorke, and burnt the suburbs of the city, and took sir John of Byttain earle of Richmond prisoner, with manie other.

Many herdsmen and certain women of England, and of other parts of the world, gathered themselves together, and would go seeke the holie Land, to kill the enemies of Christ, as they said: but because they could not passe over the great sea, they slew many Jewes in the parts of Holoune and Gascoigne, therefore many of them were taken and put to death.

The earle of Hereford bought of sir Wil. Bruce knight, a portion of land in the Marches of Wales called Colwers.

Roger Mortimer the Uncle, and Roger the Sephewe, not knowing of the foresaid bargain, had also bought the saide ground of the saide William Bruce. Also the Lord Mowbray, who had married the daughter and heire of the sayde William, claymed it by inheritance of his Wisse. Last of all, Hugh Spencer the yonger had bought that land, and put them all out, wherethroughe the foresaid nobles were soze moued, and Humfrey earle of Hereford complayned to Thomas earle of Lancaster, which two earles allured almost all the other earles and barons to take their part. Thomas earle of Lancaster being their capitaine they came to Sherborne, and from thence with Banners displayed, to Saint Albons: from thence they sent to the king being at London, requyryng him to banish the two Hugh Spencers, which were condemned by the communaltie in manie articles: which when the king woulde not grant, the barons came to London, where at length the king graunted their petition, so that Hugh Spencer the elder was banished, but the yonger Hugh fell to spoyling on the sea, taking out of two Dromydas about Sandwich, goods to the value of 40000. poundes. The barons in armour.

About the feast of S. Michael, Isabel the quene came from Canterbury to the castle of Leeds in Kent, purposing to haue lodged there that night, but she could not be permitted to enter. An. reg. 14.

In the meane time they in Leedes Castle despayring of their safegarde, the noble men with their army came to Kingston in the Nigill of Saint Simon and Jude, demanding (by the Bysshops of Canterburie and London, and the Earle of Penbrooke, who were sent betwene them) that the king woulde giue ouer his siege, promising, that they after the next Parliament woulde deliuer the Castle into the kings handes, and become obedient vnto him: but the king would not graunt the noble mens petition, who being returned into other partes, the king with much labour obtained the Castle, and hanging fire of the chiefe of those whom he found therein, he sent the wife and children of Badlesmere to the Tower of London.

to the Tower.

King Edward held his Chrismasse at Cirecester, and after Chrismasse leaving Glocester and Worcester, he with his army went to Shrewsbury and Wigornozth. Both the Mortimers meeting the king, reuerently and peaceably submitted themselves vnto him: but the king sent them both to the tower of London.

Mawrice Barkeley, and Hugh Audley in like sort submitting themselves, he sent to Wallingford Castle.

Humfrey Earle of Hereford, Gilbert Talbot, Raufe Damary, and their adherents, fled into the north to the earle of Lancaster.

About the latter end of February the king gathered an hoste & went against the rebels, and at Burton upon Trent put them to flight. The king pursuing them the 16 of March, the hostes met againe at Bosworthbridge, where Humfrey de Bohune (by a certaine Welchman, who stode vnder the bridge) being thrust into the fundament with a speare, died. There were taken in the field Thomas earle of Lancaster, with the lordes, knights, and other to the number of 65. the rest saving themselves by flight.

These, by the iudgement of Andrew Harkely earle of Carleile, were condemned.

About the feast of the Purification of our Ladie, Andrew de Herkeley late made Earle of Carlile, under colour of peace, sayned that hee woulde marrie Robert Bruce his sister. Whereupon the king reputing him a Traytour, caused him to bee taken by his trustie friend sir Anthony de Lucie, who sent him in yrons straight to London, where he was iudged before sir Anthony de Lucy in this manner. He was ledde to the barre as an earle worthily apparelled, with his sword girt about him, holed, booted, and spurred, &c. Unto whom sir Anthony spake in this manner: Sir Andrew (quoth hee) the king, for thy vallant seruice hath done thee great honour, and made thee earle of Carlile, since which time, thou, as a traitour to thy Lozde the king, leddest his people that shoulde haue help him at the battell of Beighland, auaire by the countrie of Copland, and through the earledome of Lancaster, by which meanes, our Lozde the king was discomfited there of the Scots, through thy treason and falsenelle, whereas if thou haddest come betimes, he had had the victorie: and this treason thou committedst, for the great summe of Golde and Siluer that thou receivdest of

Then commaunded hee to helme his Spurres from his heeles, then to breake his sword over his head which the king had given him, to keepe and defend his land therewith, when he made him Carle. After this, hee let unclothe him of his furred Tabard, and of his Hode, of his coate of armes, and also of his Girdle: and when this was done, Sir Anthonie saide unto him, Andrew (quoth hee) now art thou no Knight but a knave, and for thy treason, the king will that thou shalt bee hanged and drawne, and thine head smitten off from thy bodie: thy bowelles taken out of thy bodie and burned before thee, and thy bodie quartered; and thy head being smitten off, afterward to be set upon London bridge, and thy foure quarters shall be sent unto foure good towncs of England, that all other maie beware by thee. And as Anthony Lucy had saide, so was it done in all thinges, on the last daie of October.

Thetwo Mortimers committed to prison.

In the moneth of Maie the Paioz and communalitie of Cambridge, rose in great multitude against the schollers: In which tumult diuers schollers were maymed, and some slaine, and the Charters of their Priviledges tozned and sholone into the myze in miserable sort: whereupon the king sent thither Master Henry Spigurnell, Master Robert de Malberthorpe and others, with commission to punish the offence.

The second day of August the two Mortimers were adjudged to bee drawne and hanged at Westminister, for diuers robberies and murders which the king laide against them, but no execution of that iudgment was done, by reason of a writ that the king sent to Sir Richard de Swardstone then Constable of the Tower, to stay the iudgement, and the king granted them their lives, to be in perpetuall prison.

Scotland.

The 30. day of May Aymer de Valence Carle of Penbroke Hugh Spencer the younger, Robert Baldocke Archdeacon of Middlesex, Sir William Herle knight, William de Aizewine Chanon of Porke, Galside de Scroope, were for King Edward of England sent unto Newcastle upon Tyne, where they met with William Bishophe of Saint Andrewes, Thomas Randolph Carle of Mount, Iohn de Meterh, Robert de Lowther, the father, knights, and maister Walter de Tromant Clarke for the king of Scottes, there to talke of a small peace: but when that would not be, they fell to a truce, which they agreed upon for thirtene yerres, which was proclaimed about the eleuenth of June, dated at Thorpe nere unto Porke.

This yere Philip king of France died, and his brother Charles succeeded him.

About the beginning of August, King Edward being at Pickering, there came Embassas

Embassadours from the new French king, the Lord Benuille and sir Andrew de Florentia, to cite the king to come to do homage for Guyen, Aquitaine, and other lands which he held of him: and though Hugh Spencer the son Lord Chamberlaine, and Robert Baldocke Lord Chancellour, had procured the said Embassadours, not to declare their message vnto the king, yet when they should depart, they did it, admonishing him for to come.

And the said sir Andrew de Florentia being a Notarie, made a publike instrument of the said citation and admonition.

Reginald de Affer bishop of Winchester, deceased, and Iohn de Stratford succeeded in that bishopricke.

At the length going forward to the towne of Wyall, he found it well defended by Edmond of Woodstock earle of Kent, betwixt whom a final truce being taken, to continue until such time as it could be determined betwene both the kings as concerning peace, and the towne being yelded vp, both the armies departed home. King Edward kept his Christmas at Pottingham Castle with great magnificence, glozy and resort of people. 1324

The next Lent in a parliament holden at London, Adam Tarleton bishop of Hereford was accused of treason, but by the Archbishops of Canterbury, Doyke, and Dubline, and their suffragan bishops, he was taken from the bar and had away: notwithstanding inquisition being made by lawfull men of that Country, they found that he had ayded the Mortimers with horse and armour against the king, whereupon all his temporalties were seized into the kings hands. Hen. Blanford, Parliament at London.

In this Parliament the king granted a petition of the Prelate, that all the bodics of the noble men that were hanged on galowes, should be taken down, and buried in ecclesiasticall sepulture.

The king also asked a subsidy of the cleargie and people, for the redẽming of Iohn Byptaine earle of Richmond.

Adam Tarleton Bishoppe of Hereford, being deysied of all his temporall goods, did hate the Spencers deadly, so did Henry Burwash of Lincoln, (whose temporalties by the space of two yers had bene detained in the kings hands) of whom and of other were made these verses:

Mortimer of Wigmore breaketh out of the Tower.

An. reg. 18.

On Lammas day Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, by making a solempne banquet to sir Stephen Segraue constable of the Tower of London, and the other officers, and giuing to his keepers a sleepe drinke, escaped out of the Tower, breaking through the wall, and comming into the kitchen néere adioyning to the kings lodgings, and getting out of the toppe thereof, came vnto a warde of the Tower, and so with the cordes knit ladder: wise, prepared afore hand by a friend of his, got to another warde, and so with great feare got to the Charnis, and with his helper and two mo of his counsell passed the riuer, and auoiding the high waies came to the Sea, and there finding a shippe at Portsmouth, he passed ouer into France to the king there, where he liued long, looking when he might be reconciled to the king of England: his uncle Roger being still kept in filthy prison, the space almost of fife yeres very vncourteously, at length he died, and was buried at Wistow: for the escape of the yonger Mortimer, the king being sore offended, put sir Stephen Segraue out of his constableness of the tower. About the feast of S. Martin, were the Burgeses of London and of other towne attached by a Clarke, named Thomas Neubigging, who purchased a commission of the king, and by force thereof accused many, obiecting against them, that they had conference with sir Roger Mortimer, maintaining and sustaining him, on the other side the Sea, and that they ayded and counselled him to escape out of the Tower, of which inditments the good people did purge themselves, by all the course of law, before the kings Iustices, whereby that Clarke was compted a wicked man, and imprisoned as a false traytor. The king sent Embassadors to the French king, the Bishops of Winchester and of Norwich, with Iohn of Bytaine Earle of Richmond, to take order for the dukedome of Bytain, who after long debatings took a certaine forme of peace with the king.

The Queene sent into France.

King Edward kept his feast of Christmasse at Nottingham very nobly and royally, after that the truce had bene confirmed at Poike, betwixt the Englishmen and the Scots, by the graue and wise persons of both the realmes.

King Edward sent the Queene his wife vnto her brother the French king, to establish the peace, who went ouer with a small company. By her mediation a peace was fully finished, to wit, that the king of England should giue vnto his eldest sonne Edward, the dukedome of Aquitaine, and the earledome of Pontieu, and that the French king should receiue homage of him: whereupon Edward the kings sonne went ouer with a competent household about the feast of S. Mathew, and did homage vnder certaine professions, to his uncle the French king.

King Edward
banished his Queene, and her sonne.

Whiles the queene with her son remained in France longer then the kings pleasure was, and would not come againe without Roger Mortimer and other Nobles that were fledde out of Englands, and especiallie for the hatred there bare to the two Hugh Spencers, the king in displeasure banished them both, and all all other that toke their partes: whereupon many fledde ouer the Seas to the Quene, amongst the which was one, a subtil knight, sir Robert Walkefare, who slaying the Constable of Cozse Castle, brake from thence, where hee had long laine prisoner.

Sir Oliuer Ingham knight, whom the yong duke Edward had made keeper of Aquitaine, gathered a great army, and invaded the Prince of Anisow (which the French king contrary to couenants, did withholde) and brought it wholie into the dominion of England.

*Oliuer Ingham.
An. reg. 19.*

Howeouer, the kings nauy toke 100. shippes of the Normans, and brought them into England, for which cause great hatred grew betwixt the two kings and their realmes.

The quene perceiving that the nobles of France were corrupted with gifts sent out of Englande, so that shee could trust none of them, secretly conueyed her selfe and her son to the earle of Heynald, desiring aide of him: who receiued and intreated her very honourably so long as she remained there.

King Edward kept his Christmasse at S. Edmundsbury sore afrated of the Quenes returne & of those exiled persons that were with her, lest they should with a power of Aliens put him downe from his kingly dignitie, wherefore he ordeined his Castles as well in Wales as in England, to bee furnished with victualles, munitions and men: he also let keepe his riuers and coastes of the Sea, whereof the men of the Cinque portes toke the charge to defend. He also commended, that in euerie Citie, borough, towne corporate, hundred, and wapentake of England musters should be made, and their men to be exercised in armes, both on horsebacke and on fote, so that they might at all times bee ready when any hue and crie should be made, to pursue the Aliens if any came into England. And to this purpose, he ordeined Bikenings or Beacons to be set vp, that the same being fiered might be seene farre off, and thereby the people to be raised.

When she had refreshed her army at Saint Edmundsbury, she went forwards pursuing her enemies, whose gods she applied to her owne vse.

Ile of Lunday described.
A. Necham.

The king, Hugh Spencer the yonger, and Robert Baldocke, determined to flee into the Ile of Lunday, which is in the mouth of the riuer Seuerne, two miles in length euerie waie, abounding with pasture grounds, and oates, very pleasant, it bringeth forth Conies verie plentifull, it hath Pigeons and other fowles, which Alexander Necham calleth Canimedes Birdes, hauing greate nestes. Also it ministreth to the inhabitantes fresh springing waters flowing out of Fountaines, although it be on euerie side enuironed with the salt Sea: it hath onelie one entrance into it, in the which two men together can scarce goe in a front; on all the other partes, there is an high hanging ouer of a great rocke, which letteth the passage to this Island as we haue saide: it aboundeth altogether with viualles, and is verie full of wines, oile, hony, corne, bzage, get, salt-fish, flesh, and sea or earth coales.

The king being desirous to saile thither, a contrarie winde did altogether withstand him, whereupon hee scarce auoiding the cruell tempests of the seas, arrived at Glamorgan, and went to the Abbey of Meth, where, trusting so much to the promises of the Welchmen, he did praisilie lurke.

Quene Isabel came to Oxford

Adam de Sale-ton preached at Oxford.

The Quene being now of great power vnder her sonnes banner (persecuting his father) commanted the hoste to go forward in pursuing the king, till at length they were come to Oxford; where, before the whole Winter sitte, the Quene, the yong Duke of Aquitaine, Roger Mortimer, and other noblemen and souldiours, the chiefe deuiser of so wicked a dissension named Adam de Orleton Bishop of Hereford, made a publike sermon touching the Quenes coming, and cause of the army, taking for his Theame, My head grieueth mee, which which authoritie he brought to such a question, that a baime and stouthfull head, ought necessarily to bee taken awaie from the administration of a kingdome, neither ought it to be bound with any hurtfull bands of an hypocrite, &c.

After this the quene with her people came to Gloucester, from whence she went vnto Brisfolwe, where Hugh Spencer the elder committed himselfe and all his vnto the mercie of the angrie and outragious woman, who commanded the earle to be bound, and without question or answer to bee drawn and hanged in his armour, taken downe alive and bowelled, his bowelles burned, then his head smitten off, and his bodie hanged vp againe, and after foure daies to be cut all to peces and cast to dogges to be eaten, but his head was sent to Winchester. The quene went to Hereford. The is. with Robert Baldock, and Simon de Reding being taken on the sixteenth of November, was committed to the custody of Hen. earle of Lancaster, who brought him to Monmouth, to Ledbery, and so to Kenilworth castle, where he remained the space of one winter, ordered for his diet no other wise then a king.

Hugh Spencer the elder executed. King Edward taken.

The quene being at Herefords, Edmund earle of Arundell, John Daniell, and Thomas Mochelden were beheaded. Afterward Hugh Spencer the sonne Earle of Gloucester, was by certaine Welshmen, brought bounde before the quene, and without sentence or iudgement, was drawn, and hanged on a gallows thirtie fote high, and after beheaded and quartered on the foure and twentieth day of November, whose head was sent to London bridge, his quarters to foure partes of the Realme. Simon Reding was drawn and hanged on the same gallows, but tenne fote lower: Robert Baldocke, with manie opprobrious words was brought to the Bishop of Herefords prison, where he liued miserablie untill the Purification, and then he was removed to London, and cast into Newgate, where he was so hardly dealt with, that shortly after he died there.

These things being done, the quene with her sonne Edward, Roger Mortimer, and other, went to Wallingford Castle, a little before Christmas, and before the Twelst day they came to London, where the quene with much joy & great rewards was received: for all the nobility of the realme did assemble there being first summoned to come to the Parliament, to bee holden the morrowe after the saide feast of the Epiphanie, where they all iudged that the olde king was not worthish to beare the crowne, but for diuers causes was to be deposed: And that his eldest son Edward was to be chosen king with one whole consent, which consequentie was done, and the election openlie in Westminster pronounced.

The Archbyschoppe of Canterburie did consent to the election, as all other the Byschoppes did the like: whereupon the Archbyschoppe ascending into the Pulpit, preached a Sermon, taking for his theme, Vox Populi, Vox Dei, exhorting all the people to praye vnto the king of kinges for the king they had elected. The Sermon being ended, and the people departed, as soone as the quene vnderstode that her sonne was elected king, and her husband deposed, she seemed to be full of sorrow, as it were almost besides her wits; her sons also lamented his mothers heavines, and sware, that against his fathers will he would woulde neuer take the Crowne . Therefore by common decree on the behalfe of the whole Realme it was ordained, that three Bishops, two Barons, Henry of Leicester, and John earle Waren, 2. abbots, Claffenbury and Dor, two barons, Roger Grey, and Hugh Courtney, two Justices, Sir Geoffrey Scroope, and John de Stanthour, two Barons of the Portes, foure Burgeses of London, 4 knights for the communalitie of the land, &c. shoulde be sent to the king being in Benilworth castle, where they ordained as followeth: John Stratford bishop of Winchester, Adam de Arleton bishop of Hereford, and Henry Bysshop of Lincoln were sent.

The bishop of Winchester and the bishop of Lincoln went before the rest, and talked secretly with the king, together with his Keeper the Earle of Leicester, these three craftily compassed him, counselling him to make resignation of the Crowne to his eldest sonne, promising him no lesse honoz and renowne after the deposition of his royall dignitie, then his princelie estate was wont to haue of all men before. They added also, what a great reward it woulde bee at the hands of GOD, for the peace and quietnes of his subiects, for him to refuse the gouernement of a tempozall kingdome . In the other part they threatened him, that if he would not make resignation, the people withdrauing their homage and obedience, faith and friendship from him, his sonnes also being forsaken, they would crowne another king, none of the royall blood. With these and other promises and threates, the king (not without sobbes and teares) agreed to the aduertisements of the Bishops. Finally, that mischeuous Embassadour Adam de Orleton Bishop of Hereford, brought to the castle, where in the king was shut vp, the kings other enemies, whome he placed orderlie according to their dignities in the kings chamber, reseruing vnto himselfe the thinges which hee had sought long time before . At length the king comming forth of his secrete Chamber, beeing clothed in a mourning gowne, shewing himselfe to his seruants, knowing the businesse, for which they came, for verie sorrow, beeing as it were, distraught of his wittes, sodanelie swooned, the earle of Leicester, and the Bishop of Winchester did take him vp, being almost dead, and being called to his senses, Adam de Orleton Byschoppe of Hereford declaring the cause of the messengers comming, did adde, that the king shoulde make resignation of the Crowne and realme to his eldest sonne, or else, after that himselfe was refused, hee shoulde suffer them to chuse to their king another fitter man, whome they thought good for the defence of the kingdome.

resigned the croune.

The king hearing this, with much mourning answered, that hee was verie soyle, that the Commons had conceiued such wrath and indignation against him, that they disdained to be gouerned vnder his rule, for the which hee asked them forgiveness, and finally added, that hee would be very glad, if they would receiue his sonne to be their king . This resignation was made on the five and twentieth daie of Ianuarie, in the yere of Christ, after the accompt of the Historiographers (who beganne their yere at Christmas) 1327. after the accompt of the Church of Englande 1326. And forthwith in this castle, those messengers did renounce (as touching the realme) all homages and duties due to Edw. of Carnaruan late king of England by the hand of William

Trussell

Trussell knight, he in presence of the aforesaid Lords, had these words following. Unto the, O king, I William Trussell, in the name of all men of this land of England, and prolocutor of this parliament resigne to the Edward the homage that was made to the sometime, and from this time forth deprive the of all kingly power, and I shall neuer be attendant vnto the as king after this time. Then Thomas Blunt knight and Steward of the kings household, by the breaking of the Rod, resigned his office, and shewed that the kings household had free liberty to depart.

After this the messengers returned to the parliament at London, declaring the resignation that was made, and the kings answer more fully then it was made. The Commons of the realme despising old things, willingly receiued Edward of Windsor eldest sonne to Edward of Carnaruan. Also such a great dowrie was assigned to Quene Isabell, that scarce the thirde part of the reuenues of the crowne were left for her son, and his wife quene Philip. Moreover, Quene Isabell, the bishop of Hereford, and Roger Mortimer did appoint for expences to Edward of Carnaruan 100. marks the moneth.

This Edward of Carnaruan, now deprived of his royall Crowne and dignity remained with Henry earle of Leicester his kinsman, lacking nothing but libertie, where hee being shut vp, ledde his life, as if hee had bene a Monk. But the fierce and cruell woman being troubled with manie thinges, taking counsell of her wicked Scholemaster Adam de Orleton Bishop of Hereford, she had an answer of him, which did not graue her a little, that was, that the Earle of Leicester did take pittie vpon Edward his cousin. Moreover, there was talke throughout the land, that there were couenantes made amongst manie, to take king Edward by force out of the castle of Kenilworth, to the which one friar Preacher, named Thomas Dunhed, and one Clarke were assenting, for which cause he and other were imprisoned at Poike. It was therefore decreed by the cruell woman the Quene, through the subtil denise of her said Scholemaster, that Thomas of Gorney, and Iohn Maltrauers knights, hauing receiued him from the keeping of the earle of Leicester, shoulde carry Edward the olde king about whither they woulde, so that none of his well willers shoulde haue accesse vnto him, or vnderstand where hee made anie long abode.

And to these two wicked Traitors, authoritie was giuen by the highest sort, that into what soeuer part of the kingdome they bent themselves, that all gouernours and keepers of the Castles shoulde suffer them to enioie their offices and Romes during their pleasure, vpon paine of forfeiture of goods, landes, and life, if ante shoulde denie them. By meanes of which authoritie Henry earle of Leicester, through commandement of king Edward the thirde, deliuered the olde king by Indenture to Sir Thomas Barkeley, and Sir Iohn Maltrauers, and they brought him from Kenilworth, to the Castle of Corfe, then to Wiltow, where for a season he was kept shutte vp in the Castell, vntill it was vnderstande by certaine burgeses of the towne, who for his deliuerance conuicted themselves ouer sea. Wherefore in a dark night, the keepers of Edward conuey him thence to Barkeley.

the second.

These tormentors of Edward exercised towards him manie cruelties, vnto whome it was not permitted to ride, vntlesse it were by night, neither to see a nie man, or to be seene of anie. When he rode, they forced him to bee bareheaded: when he would sleepe, they would not suffer him, neither when hee was hungry would they giue him such meates as he desired, but such as he loathed: euerie word that he spake, was contraried by them, who gaue it out most slanderously, that he was madde. And shortly to speake, in all matters they were quite contrary to his will, that either by colde, watching, or vntwholsome meates, for melancholy, by some infirmite he might languish and die. But this man being by nature strong to suffer paines, and patient thorow Gods grace to abide all griefes, hee endured all the deuises of his enemies, for as touching popsons, which they gaue him often to dyinke, by the benefite of nature he dispatched away.

with hay.

These Champions bzing Edward towardees Barkeley, being guarded with a rabble of hel-houndes, along by the Grange belonging to the Castle of Wyke, where that wicked man Gorney, making a crowne of hay, put it on his head, and the souldiours that were present, scoffed, and mocked him beyond all measure, saying, A prut, auaunt sir king, making a kinde of noyse with their mouthes, as though they had sarked: they feared to be met of anie that should knowe Edward, they bent their iourney therefore towardees the lesse hand, riding along ouer the Parish grounds, lying by the riuer of Seuerne. Moreouer, deuising to disfigure him that hee might not bee knowne, they determined for to haue as well the hate of his head, as also of his beard: wherefore, as in their iourney they traualled by a little water which ranne in a ditch, they commanded him to light from his horse to be shauen, to whome, being set on a moale hill, a Barbar came vnto him with a basen of colde water taken out of the ditch, to shauen him withall, saying vnto the king, that that water should serue for that time. To whome Edward answered, that would they, should they, he would haue warme water for his beard; and, to the end that he might keepe his promise, he began to wepe, and to shed teares plentifully: At length they came to Barkley Castle, where Edward was shut vp close like an anchor. Isabell his wife taking it grieuouly that her husbands life (which she deadly hated) was prolonged, made her complaint to her Scholemaster Adam de Orleton, saying that she had certaine dreames, the interpretation whereof she misliked, which if they were true, she feared lest, that if her husband be at anie time restored to his olde dignitie, that hee would burne her for a Traytor, or condemne her to perpetuall bondage. In like sort the Bishop being guiltie in his owne conscience stood in like feare. The like feare also strooke the hearts of other for the same offence: wherefore it seemed good to many of great dignitie and bloud, as well spirituall as temporall, both men and women, that all such feare should bee taken away, desiring his death: whereupon there were letters colourably witten to the keepers of Edward, greatly blaming them, for looking so slenderly to the king, suffering him to haue such libertie, and nourishing him too delicately.

King Edward
shauen with cold water.

Moreouer, there is a priuile motion made vnto them, but yet in such sorte, as it might seeme halfe done, that the death of Edward would not bee mistaking vnto them, whether it were naturall or violent. And in this point, the great deceit of Sophisters stode in force, set downe by the Bishop who wrote thus:

Eduardum occidere nolite timere bonum est.

Kill Edward doe not feare is a good thing:

Or thus:

To seeke to shed King Edwards blood

Refuse to feare I count it good.

Which sophisticall saying is to be resolued into two propositions, whereof the first consisting of three words, to wit, Eduardum occidere nolite, doe not kill Edward, and the second of other three, that is, timere bonum est, feare is a good thing, do seeme to perswade subtilly from murthering of the king: but the receivers of these letters, not ignorant of the writing, changed the meaning thereof to this sense, Eduardum occidere nolite timere, to kill Edward doe not feare: and afterwards these wordes, bonum est, it is good, so that they being guiltie, turned a good saying into euill.

The Bishop being thus determinately purposed touching the death of Edward, and toarily prouiding for himselfe, if by any chance he should be accused thereof, craftely worketh that the authoritie which he gaue by writing, might seeme to be taken expressely contrary to his meaning, by reason of accenting and pointing of the same.

To conclude, the murtherers of Edward hoping to haue sounde both Isabel and the Bishoppe to be their trustie friends, they found them earnest persecutors of their enterpryse, quite denying whatsoeuer they had deuised against Edward, yea, they were greatly busied in deuising most cruell death for them, so that the murtherers being quite dismayed, wist not what to doe: but they read the Letters of Isabel, the Bishoppe, and other conspiratours, being confirmed with their owne handes and seales, which the Bishoppe refused not, but confessed to be his and others, but construed them to an other sense, accusing them to be false interpreters of his Letters, and of his owne authoritie threatened them, vntill hee forced them to runne away. Thus much touching the Letters.

Now when king Edward was brought vnto the Castle aforesaide, hee was courteously receiued by Thomas Barkeley then Lord of the see, who was allowed 100. shillings the day for the time: But after the tormentors had receiued their letters of gouernment ouer the Castle, the said Thomas is commanded to be no familiaritie with Edward: therefore Thomas Barkeley with his wife there departeth thence to other his dwelling places: And Edwards persecution continuing to his death, beganne to take effect. For after this he was shut vp in a close chamber, where, with the stench of dead carcases, laide in a Cellar vnder him, he was miserably tormented many daies together, in such sort, that he was well nigh suffocated therewith. And that paine was almost intolerable vnto him, It appeareth by the complaint he made on a certaine day.

day at the chamber window, certaine carpenters then working on y<sup>e</sup> right side therof, hearing the same. But those tyrants perceiuing that this terrible stench was not of a sufficient force to cause the death of this balliant man Edward, one night being the 22. of September, they came rushing in vpon him so dauntlie, as he laye in his bed, with great and heauie featherbeds, bearing in weight as much as 15. strong men coulde beare, wherewith they oppressed and strangled him by smothering. Into whome also they thrust a plummers sodging yron, being made red hot, vp into his bowelles, through a certaine Instrument like to the end of a Trumpet or glister pipe, put in at the fundament, burning thereby his inward parts, prouiding thereby least ante wound being founde in the kings bodie, might cause his tormenters to answer for committing open treason, and therefore suffer iust punishment. In this sort was this brave knight oppressed, crying out with a lowd voice, so that many as well within the castle, as without heard it, perceiuing it to be y<sup>e</sup> crye of one that suffered violent death, which caused manye of Barkley, and also of the castle (as themselves affirmed) to take compassion thereof, and to praye for the soule of him that was then departing the world. And this was the ende of Edward of Carnaruan, being betrayed as is aforesaid: but to colour the matter that they might seeme guiltlesse in this case, Isabel and the bishop of Hereford laboured to cleare themselves by banishing and outlawing of Thomas Gorney, and John Maltrauers, laying as it were all the fault vpon them.

This Thomas Gorney flying to Paris, and there lying hid y<sup>e</sup> space of thre yeres, was at length espied and taken, and as he was brought towards England, there to haue receiued iust and worthy punishment for his deserts, he was beheaded on the sea, fearing that if he had bene brought into England, he would haue accused diuers other great personages. The other, to wit, Iohn Maltrauers, liuing in great contrition and repentance, spent a long time in Dutchland. Thus far out of Thomas de la More, a worshipfull knight, that then liued and wrote in the French tongue what he saw with his eyes, or heard crediblie reported, by them that saw, and some that were actors. All which was (at the said sir Tho. de la Mores request) translated, and more orderlie penned in the Latine tongue, by Walter Baker, alias Swinborne, chanon of Wsney besides Wsford.

Now to conclude this history, of the raigne and end of king Edward the second, called of Carnaruan, for that he was borne there: he was deposed on the 25. of January, in the yere of Christ 1326. when he had reigned 19. yeres, six moneths and od daies, and was murdered on the 21. of September next following, being the feast of S. Mathew the Apostle, in the yere of Christ 1327. whose death was not published till after the feast of all Saints, and he was buried at Glocester on the feast daie of S. Thomas the Apostle, or 21. of December. He had issue by Isabel his wife, Edward, which was elected king, and to whome hee resigned in his life: Iohn of Eltham earle of Cornetwall, that died at the towne of S. Iohn in Scotland without issue: Ioane of the Towre Quene of the Scots and Elianor Countesse of Gueldar, that died young.

King Edward the third.

Edward the third bozne at Windsor, about the age of fourteene yeres, after the deposing of his father, began his raigne the 25. day of January, in the yere of our Lord 1326. after the account of the Church of England. He was crowned at Westminster, on the first day of February, by Walter Reignolds Archbishop of Canterburie. This Prince was endued with passing beauty and fauour, of wit pꝛouident, circumspect, and gentle of nature: of excellent modestie and temperance. He advanced such persons to dignities, as did most excell other in innocencie of life. In feats of armes he was very expert, as the noble enterprises by him atchieued doe well declare. At the beginning of his raigne, he was chiefly ordered by his mother Isabel, vnto whom was assigned so great a dowrye, that the third part of the kingdome did scantly remaine to her sonne.

The inhabitants of the towne of Burie in Suffolke, assembled themselves in warlike manner on St. Lukes day last befoze passed, in the twentieth yere of Edward the second, and besieged the abbey of Burie, bzent the gates, beat and wounded the Monks, bare out of the abbey all the gold, silver, ornaments, bookes, Charters, and other writings, with the assay of their coine, stampes, and all other things pertaining to their Mint: and all other goods, as Wasse, Pewster, Iron, Lead, &c. They also bzent many houses about the abbey, and in the towne, pertaining to the Abbot, with his manors in Werton, Wackenham, Rugham, Oldham, Hernigesbury, Pewto, Whipsled, Westle, Riseby, Ingham, Ferneham, Redwell, Haberdon, and others, with all the cozne in the same manors, & bzene away the horses, cren, kine, swine, sheepe, &c. They bzew the Monks out of their Abbey and put them in prisons, & after brought them againe to their Chapter house, where they forced them to search Charters at their pleasure, &c. foz the which facts, the malefactozs were this yere by vertue of the kings commission directed to Thomas Carle of Dorset, Marshall of England, Thomas Bardolfe, and others, apprehended and convicted: nineteene of them were hanged, and one pressed to death. After this, the whole inhabitants of the Towne, foz that they had not stayed the malefactozs of their enterprise in the beginning (as they might haue done) were amerced to pay the Abbot toward his dannages 140000. pound. Fewer the lesse, the Abbot and Couent at the Kings request (who was there present with his Nobilitie) forgaue and remitted to them 122333. pound. The Kings eight pence of the summe: and foz the rest vsed such fauour, that if they truly payd 2000. markes in twentie yeres following, and obserued their covenants foz god order and quietnesse, they forgaue them all the rest.

About this time, the like stirre was made against the Monkes of Canterburie: whereof I find recozded as followeth.

*Record, Eccles.
Christi Cantua.*

King Edward preparing an army into Scotland, commanded the Bailiffes and Citizens of Canterburie, to furnish him twelue horsemen, and send them to Newcastle, toward which charge, the citizens required aid of the Monks: who answered them, that without the assent of the king and their archbishop, they would not agree therunto, for so much as the kings of England had founded their Church in free and perpetuall almes. Whereupon, William Chylham Baylyffe, and many Commons of the citie, assembled themselves in the Preaching Friers Churchyard, conspired and swore against the Monkes, as followeth.

1 That they would ouerthrow the pentises, windowes, and milne, belonging to the Monkes.

2 That no Citizen should dwell in any house belonging to the Monkes.

3 That all rents belonging to the Monkes of Canterburie should be gathered to the use of the Commons.

4 That no man should lend or sell to the Monkes any victuals.

5 That they should sell all the horses and beasts that came into the citie with carriage to the Monkes.

6 That all such Monkes as came forth of their house should be spoiled of their garments.

7 That a trench should be cast, to stoppe all men from going in or coming out.

8 That every Pilgrime should at his entring, swear that he should make no offering.

9 Also, that every of those commons aforesaid should weare on their finger a ring of gold of those that belonged to Thomas Becket.

Sir Iohn the Carles brother of Benault, came to helpe Edward the third against the Scots, with five hundred men of armes: which Benawdors and the Englishmen fell out by chaunce on Trinitie Sunday at Poike, where eightie of the Lincolnshire men were slaine, and much of the citie of Poike was burned: and the Englishmen slaine were buried vnder a stone in Saint Clements Churchyard in Foslegate.

The king went against the Scots that were entred England, as farre as Stanhope Marke in Warbale, where they were besieged three dayes, but they escaped. This yeere also king Edward the second was murdered on the 22. of September, as is before declared.

This yeere died Charles king of Fraunce the third brother, which was brother to the Ladie Isabel Queene of England, mother to king Edward the third: by whose death the succession of the kingdome of Fraunce came to the said Edward, but it was vsurped and possessed by Philip de Valoys uncle to the said Charles, who did intrude himselfe by force.

third married.

King Edward married Philip daughter to William Earle of Holland and Benault, at Poike the five and twentieth of Februarie: she was sisters daughter to Philip de Valoys aforesaid.

A Parliament was holden at North-hampton, in which a shamefull peace was made betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, so that David the sonne of Robert Bruce, scarce seven yeres old, married Ioane of the Tower king Edwards sister, at Berwicke the twelfth of July. Also the king made the Scots charters, the tenour whereof was unknowne to the Englishmen: but all was done as it pleased the old Quene, Roger Mortimer, and James Dowglas. The Scots made many taunting rimes against the Englishmen, for the fond disguised apparell by them at that time used: amongst the which this was fashioned upon the Church doores of Saint Peter toward Stangate:

Thomas de Cobham Bishop of Worcester also deceased, to whome succeeded Adam de Orleton in that Bishopricke.

In a Parliament at Salisburie, the king made thre Carles, John of Gloucestre his brother Earle of Cornewall, Roger Mortimer Earle of the March, and James Butler of Ireland Earle of Dymond. From this Parliament the Earle of Lancaster, the Lord Wake, Henrie Beamond, Earle of Arthall, and other noble men did absent themselves, not being far off from thence in armor, for the which the king was highly displeased: notwithstanding in Sommer following, they submitted themselves unto the kings mercy, seeking his fauor.

Salisburie.

Certaine men of this land, to the intent to trie what friends they had in England, craftily deuised that Edward the second king of England was aliue in the Castle of Corfe, but not to be seene in the day time, and therefore they used many nights to make the wyes, & masking with dancing vpon the towres and walles of the Castle, which being perceiued by people of the countrey, it was thought there had ben some great king vnto whom they did these great solemnities: this rumor was spred ouer all England, to wit, that the old king was aliue: whence it came to passe, that the Earle of Kent sent thither a fryer preacher, to try the truth of the matter, who (as it was thought) hauing corrupted the porter of the castle with rewards, is let in, where he lay all the day in the porters lodge very close: and when night was come, he was willed to put on the habit of a Lay man, and then was brought into the hall, where he saw (as he thought) Edward the father of the king sitting royally at supper, with great maiestie. This fryer being thus perswaded, returned againe to the Earle of Kent, and reported as he thought, what he saw: whereupon the Earle said and affirmed with an oath, that he would endeaunour by all the meanes he could to deliuer his brother from prison.

the said Carle of Kent, and many other noble men and religious persons, to wit, the prouincials of the white Carmelite Fryers, and of the blacke preaching Fryers, and Fryer Richard Wilton were accused of conspiracie, touching (as it was said) the deliuerie of the Kings father: which matter although it were but deussed fantasie and a mere lye, yet the said Carle for certaine confessions which he made, and for certaine letters which were found about him, was there beheaded. The other, to wit, the prouincials of the Predicants and Carmelites, were banished: but the bishop of London was set at libertie. Robert de Taunton priest, and some certaine Carmelite Fryers and Predicants, were condemned to perpetuall prison. The death of the said Carle was the lesse lamented, because his family and seruants had aboute measure afflicted the Commons, in taking vp thyngs (as they trauailed) at the kings price, paying nothing or very little for it.

There was a Parliament holden at Nottingham, where Roger Mortimer was in such glozy and honour, that it was without all comparison. No man durst name him any other than Carle of March: a greater route of men waited at his heeles, than on the Kings person: he would suffer the king to rise to him, and would walke with the King equally, step by step, and cheeke by cheeke, neuer preferring the king, but would go for most himselfe with his officers: he greatly rebuked the Carle of Lancaster, cousin to the King, for that without his consent he appointed certain lodgings for noble men in the towne, demanding who made him so bold, to take vp lodgings so nigh vnto the queen: with which words the Constable being greatly feared, appointed lodging for the Carle of Lancaster one myle out of the towne: and likewise were lodged the Carle of Hereford, John de Bohune of Essex, high Constable of England, and others. By which meanes, a contention rose among the Noblemen, and great murmuring among the common people, who said, that Roger Mortimer the Quenes Paragon, and the Kings Master, sought all the means he could to destroy the Kings blood, and to vsurpe the Regall State: which report troubled much the Kings friends, to wit, William Mountacute, and other, who for the safegard of the King, sware themselves to be true to his person, and by so vnto them Robert de Holland, who had of long time ben chiefe keeper of the castle, vnto whome all secret corners of the same were knowne. Then vpon a certaine night, the King lying without the castle, both he & his friends were brought by torch-light through a secret way vnder ground, beginning far off from the said castle, till they came euen to the Quens chamber, which they by chaunce found open: they therfore being armed with naked swords in their hands, went for wards, leaving the king also armed without the doze of the Chamber, least y his mother should despise him: they which entred in, slew Hugh Turpinton knight, who resisted them, Master John Neuell of Pozneby gining him his deadly wound. From thence, they went to ward the Quene mother, whome they found with the Carle of March ready to haue gone to bedde: and hauing taken the said Carle, they ledde him out into the hall, after whome the Quene followed, crying, Bel filz, bel filz, ayes pitie de gentil Mortimer, Good sonne, good sonne, take pitie vpon gentle Mortimer: for the suspected that that her sonne was there, though she saw him not. Then are the keyes of the Castle sent for, and every place with all the furniture is yielded up into the kings hands, but in such secret wise, that none without the castle, except the kings friends, understood thereof. The next day in the morning very early, they bring Roger Mortimer, & other his friends taken with him, with an horrible shout & crying (the earle of Lancaster then blind, being one of them that made the shout for joy) towards London, where he was committed to the Tower, and afterward condemned at Westminster, in presence of the whole Parliament on S. Andrewes euen next following, and then drawne to the Elmes, and there hanged on the common gallows, whereon he hung two dayes and two nights by the Kings commaundement, and then was buried in the Gray Friers Church. He was condemned by his Peeres, and yet neuer was brought to answer before them, for it was not then the custome, after the death of the Carles of Lancaster, Winchester, Gloucester, and Kent: wherefore this Earle had that sayd himselfe, which he appointed for other.

The causes of his death laid against him, were these:

First, that he was consenting to the murdering of the Kings father.

Secondly, for that he had receiued a great summe of money, whereby the Kings honour was greatly abated at Stanhope Parke, where he gaue a signe vnto the Scots that they should lie.

Thirdly, for that he caused certaine auncient deeds and Charters to be bent, wherein the king of Scots stood bound vnto the king of England: and especially for that he had caused a contract to be made betwixt the Kings sister, and Dauid the sonne of Robert le Bruce.

Fourthly, that he had vnprofitably consumed a great deale of treasure which he found in the kings treasure, and in the treasure of the Carles of Winchester and Gloucester.

Fifthly, for appropriating vnto himselfe the wardes and marriages of all England.

Sixtly, for being an euill Counsellor to the king, and to the Quene mother, and for being ouermuch familiar with her. King Edward held a sollemne Christmas at Wells in Somersetschire, which he continued till the feast of the Epiphanie, where were many strange and sumptuous shewes made, to pleasure the King and his guests.

In the beginning of August, Edward Bailiol, sonne and heire to John King of Scots, came into England, which Edward had ben befoze that time banished out of Scotland. At his coming, he declared what right he had in the kingdome. Henry Beaumont Earle of Bohune, Gilbert Vmfrueil Earle of Angus, David Earle of Athels, Richard Talbot, Ralph Barch of Staffordre, Fulx Fitz Williams, with many other noble men, affirming they had right of inheritance in Scotland, desired licence and ayde of the King of England, to recover the said kingdome and lands due to them, but the King hauing regard of the peace lately made, and also for his sisters sake Quene of Scots, would not suffer them to leade an armie thzough his land, wherefoze the said Lords getting a flect of shyps, entred the sea, and sayling toward Scotland, landed at Binkhorne, where the Earle of fife, and Robert Bruce, bassard son to Robert Bruce, with ten M. Scots resisted them nere vnto Dunfermeling: but the Englishmen put them to flight, and slew many. After ward, to wit, on S. Laurence day, they had a fore confliat at Gledesmoze, where two thousand Englishmen ouercame fourtie thousand Scots. By reason of the great thzong of the multitude amongst themselves, five Carles, & many other were thzonged to death. On the morow, the Englishmen toke the Towne of S. Johns, well furnished with victuals.

The seuen and twentieth of September, Edward Bailiol was crowned King of Scots, but after ward he resigned it to King Edward of England, and remayned vnder his protection many yeres after.

Henry Earle of Lancaster and Leicester, igh Steward of England, founded the new Hospitall by the castle of Leicester, wherein were one hundred poze impotent people prouided for with all things necessary.

Edward Bailiol, and the foresaid Lords and Nobles continued the warres in Scotland, vnto whome came many other Noble men of the Realme of England voluntarily, serving of their owne charges, and besieged Berwike.

The King of England gathered a great power, and besieged Berwike, which at length was yielded for want of victualles. During this siege, the Scots fought many wayes to remove the same, leaviing a great armie ouer al Scotland: but coming to the siege, they could not bring their purpose to effect, yet still prouoking the Kings armie to battell: whereupon at length the two armies appoynted to fight, and setting out vpon Halidowne hill, there commeth forth of the Scots campe a certaine stoute Champion of great stature, who for a fact by him done, was called Turnebull: he standing in the midst betwixt the two armies challenged al the Englishmen, any one of them to fight with him a Combat: at length, one Robert Venale Knight, a Dorsetshire man, requesting licence of the King, being armed, with his sword drawne, marcheth toward the Champions, meeting by way a certaine blacke mastiffe Dogge, which waited on the Champion, whom with his sword he sodainly strake, and cut him off at his loynes, at the sight whereof the master of the Dogge flaine, was much abashed, and in his battell more warie and fearefull: whose left hand and head also after ward, this worthy Knight cut off. After this Combate both the armies met, but they fighting scarce half an houre, certaine of the Scots being flaine, they closed their armie (which was in three) all into one battell, but at length flying, the King followed them, taking and chasing them into lakes and pittes, for the space of five miles. There were flaine of them eight Earles, 1300. Horsemen, and of common souldiers 35000. at a place by Berwike, called Bothull, nere vnto Halidon.

In the meane season the Scots had besieged the castle of Bamburgh, in which at that time the Quene was: but when they heard of the victorie aforesaid, they left the siege and fled. The towncsmen of Berwike yielded to the King of England both the castle and the Towne, who placing garrisons there, he sent Edward Bailiol, and other Nobles to keepe the Realme of Scotland. Earle Patricius, in the next Parliament holden at Porke made fealtie, and did homage vnto the King by oath, who receiued of the King for yielding by of Berwike vnto him, many honours and preferments: not withstanding this Earle returned againe to rebellon, who holding Dunbar against the King, was besieged by William Mountacute Earle of Salisburie.

This yere, William Elsing Mercer of London (obtaineing the Kings licence) made a new Hospitall of an old house of Nunnes by Crælegate with in the wall of London, and placing Chanons Regular there, he became their first Prior, endowing the same with Lands for the reliefe of the poore and impotent.

Lewes de Beamount Bishop of Durham deceased on the 28. of September, and was buried at Durham, he builded a wall of stone about the citie of Durham, and a hall with a Chappel at Middleham, vnto him succeeded Richard de Bury by the Kings appointment.

Parliament at Poike.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Wallingford, and immediately after, the Quene was deliuered of a daughter named Isabel at Woodstocke.

The King summoned a Parliament to be holden at Poike, the same to begin on Monday the second weeke of Lent: to the which Parliament, the king of Scots (called Conquerour) although he were warned to be there, yet he came not, but sent messengers to excuse him, to wit, Henry de Bellemount and William Mountacute Charles, and certaine other Barons and Knights, who signified, that the King of Scots Conquerour could not be there without great danger, for that certaine Scottes lay in the Islands ready to do him damage.

did homage.

At the feast of Saint Iohn Baptiste, the said king of Scots Conquerour did his homage to king Edward of England at Newcastle vpon Tyne, and not long after that king Edward took homage of the Duke of Brytaine, for the Carle dome of Richmont.

Parliament at London.

In a Parliament at London it was told the king, that the Scots had taken Richard Talbot, and six other knights, and had slaine many footmen: wherefore the king took a fiftenth of the Laitie, and a tenth of the Cleargie, to the intent the malice of the Scots might be brized.

Vniuersitie at Stamford for bidden.

This yere in the moneth of Nouember diuers masters and schollers of Oxford withdrew themselves to Stamford, minding there to haue begunne an Vniuersitie, without licence of the king obtained in that behalfe: whereat the king being offended, did by proclamation utterly forbid it, & suppressed it.

King Edward
entred Scots
land.

King Edward went toward the Marches of Scotland, and wintered in those coasts, but understanding that the Carle Daffels was traitterously turned to the Scots, and Henry Bellemount besieged by the Scottes, he entred Scotland, and raised the siege, and then kept his Christmas at Korbrow, to which castle he repaired. Presently after the feast of the Epiphanie, the French king sent messengers to K. Edward, to wit, the Bishop of Aurenges, and certaine Lords, to treat a peace for the Scots, who waited for an answer in England till mid-lent, and then at Nottingham a truce was graunted vnto them till the feast of S. Iohn next comming, that in the meane time a Parliament might be holden of matters concerning peace, and the state of both the kingdomes: in which Parliament holden at Poike, it was decreed that the king should passe with his armie through Scotland, beyond the Scottish seas, the which thing was quickly performed & done: but the Scots desirous to fight a field, they feigned that they would haue peace, to obtaine the which, many came about the feast of S. Michael, and chiefly the Carle of Daffels:

whereupon it came to passe, that after ward the Earle of Hereford being taken prisoner at Enderburgh, was sent to be kept prisoner in England, and Richard Talbot was ransomed for two thousand five hundred markes, but the Earle of Walsell willing to shewe that he was truly revolted to the king of England, rode against the Scottes at a siege of a certaine castle, and falling into the hands of his enemies, because he would not yield, he was slaine with thirtene of his men.

After the feast of Saint Michael, the king continuing still in the marches of Scotland, was daily entreated by messengers from the French king, concerning some peace to be made.

About the feast of S. Martine, Edward Bohune a noble man, was drowned in the Marches of Scotland: for as he was dining a bottie of Cattell over a riuer, he felt himselfe in daunger, causing his guide to ride before him through the water, where through the smoothnesse of the stone whereon the water ran, his guide not being able to take sure footing fell downe, with his master being armed, and before any helpe could come, they were drowned in the bottome of the channell.

John Archbishop of Canterburie went over the Sea to Philip de Valois King in France, requesting of him the continuance of peace and amitie betwixt the two kingdomes to be maintained. Secondly, that all towncs and castles taken before time by his father, should be restored to the King of England. Thirdly, that the said French King should sweare, neuer to giue aid to the Scottes against the King of England: vnder which conditions, the two Kings of both Realmes should prepare to trauaile towards the Holy Land, and to fight against the enemies of Christ. But the French King accounted the King of England not worthy of his friendship, so long as he continued warres against the Scots his friends, whome he said were iust men. Vnto the second petition he would not other wise consent thereunto, than if all charges were repaid againe which his father Charles de Valois laid out in the warres of Gascoigne. Thirdly, he said, that he was a friend and louer of iustice and equitie, which he would neuer swarue from, neither for friendship, nor affinitie, but he would by all meanes he could, molest and bere all breakers of the peace of the kingdom of Scotland: for (saith he) there shall neuer be perfect peace and quietnesse among Christians, before the King of France sit in place of iudgement for the right of the Kingdomes of France, England, and Scotland.

Vpon Saint Clements night, through abundance of waters, but specially high waters: in the Thames, all the cattell and beasts nere thereunto were drowned, and the land made vnfruitfull by salt waters.

King Edward had a tenth of the Cleargie, and also of the Burgeses, and a fiftenth of the Commons.

About the feast of Pentecost, he held a Parliament at North-hampton, where leauing the Prelates, States, and commons debating about matters, himselfe secretly rode to Berwike, and there taking with him a few men of armes, he went to Saint Johns Towne, which he strengthened with trench and and rampire, and sent his Carles, with the king Conquerour, to make an incrode vpon the Countrey, and to see what Scots they could finde would resist them: but none durst abide their comming, but hid themselves in hills, Woods, and Marishes, and in the meane time many Carles and Barons came, and submitted themselves to King Edward vpon conditions as followeth.

These be the poynts agreed betwixt the Conncell of the Kings of England and Scotland on the one party, and Alexander Mowbrey, Geffrey Mowbrey, Gouffrey de Roos, William Bullocke, and Eustace de Loreyne, hauing full power from David Stravulgi, Earle of Daffels, and Robert Steward of Scotland, to treat, accord, and affirme all poynts enterparled and to be enterparled betwixt the said kings, and the Earle, and Steward, as appeareth by their letters patents of either partie.

First it is accorded that the said Earle Daffels, the great men, and all other of the communalitie of Scotland, which shall come in the same conditions, shall haue life and member, lands and tenements, fees and offices within Scotland, which they ought to haue by inheritance or right, those except, which shall be surprisid by common assent.

Item, that they shall be pardoned of imprisonment, and of all manner trespasses by them done in the Realing of England and Scotland from the beginning of the world, vnto the date of these presents.

Item, the Earle Daffels, and Alexander Mowbrey, shall haue lands, tenements, possessions, and fees in England, which they had at their departure, after the homage done at Newcastle vpon Tyne.

Item, that the franchises of the Church in Scotland shall be maintayned, after the auncient vlage of Scotland.

Item, that the lawes of Scotland in Borough Townes, & Shires, wikes, within the lands of the king of Scotland, be vled after the auncient vlagages and custome of Scotland, as they were vled in the dayes of king Alexander.

Item, that the offices of Scotland be ministred by people of the same Nation, yet notwithstanding, that alwaies the king of Scotland may put such officers in as shall please him, of what nation soeuer they be.

Item, that all those that within the conditions of the Earle Daffels haue lands within the lands of the king of England in Scotland, shall haue againe the same lands, tenements, possessions, offices and fees, as they had them at their departure, after their homage done at Newcastle vpon Tyne, except those that shall be surprisid by common assent.

Item, that if they be empled for their landes and tenements aforesaid, that they haue their defences and recoueries in Court where they ought to haue.

Item, as touching the demaund which the Earle Daffels claimeth, that the king of England ought to acquitte his lands in England which he hath in gage for eight hundred markes, the king neither ought, nor will do it, but as touching the Manor of Wyppingdone, which the said Earle laide to pledge for two hundred and fiftie pounds, it is accorded that if the said Earle do come within one

one yeare, after the date of these presents, and will acquite the Panoz, the king shall cause that he have the same Manour.

Item, as touching the Castle and Landes of Chilling, it is accorded that the said Earle be in the same poynt that he was befoze at his departure, and have his reconerte by lawe, and the king promisseth in good faith that he will cause that he may have the land, without delaying either partle. And touching the lands which the sayd Earle claymeth to have in Porsfolke, of the which he hath charters, it is accorded that his charters being seen of the kings Counsell, he will doe reason.

Item, that in case any man surmise treason vpon the saide Earle, he may defend himselfe by his bodie, according to the lawes and vsages of Scotland, and on the marches, and that all those that be within these conditions, have the like graunt.

Item, as to the pardon which William Ramsey knight demaundeth for the trespass by him done to William Lord Mountague, to wete, for beating down his castle of Haghford, the same William shall be ready to doe according to that that shall be aduised by the Kings of England and Scotland.

Item, that the said Stacie de Loraine haue his lands and tenements which he ought to haue within the Realme of Scotland, and if any man haue trespasssed towards him, he shall haue his recovery by law. Witten at Saint Johns Towne in Scotland the 18. of August, Anno 1335.

Philip Quene of England did beare her second sonne named William, at Hatfield, who shortly after died.

About the feast of the Epiphanye, the King and the Archbishop returned out of Scotland, to the burfall of Iohn of Eltham, Earle of Cornewall, brother vnto the King, who deceased at Berwike in the moneth of October, and was buried at Westminster. At which time, the King kept a Parliament at London, which began on the Munday after Saint Mathies day: and on the first Sunday in Lent, he made his eldest sonne Edward Earle of Chester, and Duke of Cornewall. He made also sixe other Earles, Henrie of Lancaster (sonne to Henrie Earle of Lancaster) Earle of Derby, Hugh Audley Earle of Gloucester, William Bohune Earle of North-hampton, William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, William Clinton Earle of Huntingdon, Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke, to the which Robert he at that time gaue the Panoz of Base-court, in the Parish of Saint Giles without Cræplegate of London, commonly called to this day the Barbicane, because in olde time the same had been a Burgekening, or watch-tower for the citie.

The same day, the King made twentie Knights, to wit, Sir Edward Mountacute, Sir Thomas Somerton, Sir Isle, Sir Darcy Richard, Sir Damuory, Sir Iohn Poultney, Sir de Mere, Roger Banant, Roger Hilary, Sir Bolingbroke, Sir Butterel, Sir Simon Swanland, William Scot, William Bassett, Robert Sodingon, William Zouffes, Sir Cogshall, Roger Sangraule, Thomas de la More mine Authoz, and Iohn Strache.

In the same Parliament it was enacted, that no woll growing within the Realme of England, should be transpoed out of the same, but that it should it was twentie times more bled than before.

Also it was enacted, that no man should after that time buy any cloth that was made beyond the sea, and that none should weare any Furses, but such

After the feast of Saint Michael, a Parliament was holden at London, and a Conuocation was assembled by the Archbishop, wherein the Clergie granted a tenth for thre yeres, and the Commons a fiftenth, in consideration of the Kings warres which was hot in Scotland, and also to resist the French King, who made great braggies, and shewed great crueltie, for he outlawed, slew, and imprisoned all Englishmen, and confiscated the goods and cattels of all that were found in his kingdome of Fraunce, threatening that he would be reuenged for his friends the Scots.

The warres being thus as aforesaid begun betwixt the two kingdomes, the rumour thereof came vnto the court of Rome, whereupon the Pope sent two Cardinals for the reformation and ordering of the peace betwixt the two kingdomes: who comming to Westminster, declared before the King the cause of their comming: whereunto the K. answered, that although without all reason they did seeme to restraine him of right and equitie, for that he ought to succeed into the kingdome of his forefathers, the which his aduer-sarie Philip de Valois did deny him, expelling, murdering, and imprisoning his people, and taking away the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and Earldome of Poytiers without cause, maintaining the Scots and other rebels against him,

yet these iniuries not withstanding, he was contented if they could take order for the quiet enioying of Aquitaine, and other lres belonging vnto him, which his predeceffors did enioy.

Howeouer, for the dismissing of all aid that the French king should giue vnto the Scots at any time of rebellion, for the which he offered his money, and also the marriage of his eldest sonne, and also to resigne all such rites and interest that he had to the kingdome of Fraunce.

The Cardinals being greatly comforted with this answer, departed, hoping that all warres were now ended. They toke with them Iohn the Archbishop of Canterburie, Richard Bishop of Durham, & Geoffrey Lord Scrope, who all together went on message with the kings answer to the French King, hauing full authoritie to treat and conclude a peace.

These being so reasonable offers, could not pacifie the furious mind of the French King, who reposed great trust in the Scots, hoping by them, and through their meanes, quite to dispossesse, and to disinherite the king of England of all the title he had.

Also this yere because of the warres with Fraunce, king Edward caused to be confiscated all the goods of the Priories aliens in England, that is to say, such Priories as were selles to any monasteries in Fraunce. He let out the Priories to farme, with all their lands and tenements, and rented them at his pleasure for the space of thre and twentie yeres: in the which time diuers of those Priories were purchased of the king, made free, and againe (as it were) new founded by Englishmen, as Witburie in the Castle, and other: the residue not changed, were in the five and thirtieth yere of King Edwards raigne againe restored to their lands: as shall be shewed when I come to it.

The fourth of October, fiftie Gallies well manned and furnished, came to South-hampton about nine of the clocke, and sacked the towne, the towne men running away for feare: by the breake of the next day they which fled, by helpe of the countrey thereabout, came against the Pyrats, and fought with them:

them, in the which skirmish were slaine to the number of thre hundred Pyrates, together with their Captaine a young Souldiour the King of Sicils sonne. To this young man, the French king had giuen whatsoeuer he got in the kingdome of England: but he being beaten downe by a certaine man of the countrey, cryed Rancon, not withstanding the husband-man layd him on with his clubbe, till he had slaine him, speaking these wordes: yea (quoth he) I know well enough thou art a Francon, and therefore shalt thou dye, for he vnderstood not his speech, neither had he any skill to take Gentlemen prisoners, and to keepe them for their ranfome: wherefore the residue of those Scennowayes, after they had set the Towne a fire and burnt it by quite, fledde to their Galleyes, and in their flying, certaine of them were drowned. And after this, the inhabitants of the towne compassed it about with a strong and great wall.

The king still maintaining his warres in Fraunce, on the euen of the Annunciation of our Lady, eleuen gallies appoaching to the towne of Harwich, they cast fire therein: the force wherof, by a contrary wind was staled, so that no great harme was done thereby. Furthermoze, in the same yere about the feast of Pentecost, certaine Pyzats of Normandie and Genoa (shipped in Gallies and Pinnaces) made a shew on the Sea about South-hampton, as they would haue come aland, and threathned soze to spoile the towne againe, but perceiuing the townsmen ready to resist them, they returned to the Ile of Wight, but entred not, being put backe by the inhabitants: whereupon they sailed about the sea coasts, seeking to land in places lesse defended, and after came to Hastings, where they bent ffishers cottages, with their boats, and slew many men. Also they made great shewes many times against the Ile of Thanet, Douer, and Fulkestone, but in those places they did little harme, except to poze fishermen: thence they sailed about to the hauens of Cornwall and Deuonshire, doing in all places much harme to the fishermen, and such ships as they found vnmanned, they fiered. At length they entred Pismouth Haven, where they bent certaine great ships, and a great part of the Towne: these were met by Hugh Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, a knight of fourescore yeres old, being accompanied with many souldiours of his countrey, who hauing lost at the first front a fewe of his men which were slaine by the quarels of the French, toynd to fight with them hand to hand, and slaying many of the pyzates vpon drie land, chased the residue which fledde to take their gallies, and being not able to come nigh them by wading, they were drowned in the sea to the number of fise hundred. Fewes being brought to the King lying in Wabant, that diuers Portes of England were spoiled with the Pirates, he declared to his friendes, to wit, the Marques of Juliacense, and a certaine Cardinall, what great causes hee had to reuenge himselfe vpon them, and in the end, was answered by the Cardinall as followeth.

The kingdome of Fraunce (saide he) is compassed about with a threde of silke, which cannot bee broken, by all the strength of the kingdome of England, wherefore my Lord king, you must stay for the coming of the Dutchmen,

The King taking great disdain herat, staying nothing at all, said, that he would ride into the land of Fraunce with banner displayed, and that there he would looke for that mightie power of the French men, and that he would either win the same against any man that should withstand him, or else honestly die in the field.

The first day of the assumption of our Lady, a suddaine inundation of water at Newcastle vpon Tyne, surmounted the wall, and bare downe a peece of the Towne wall, a fire pearches in length nere to a place called Wallknew, where 160. men, and seuen Chapleins and women were drowned.

In the Vigil of S. Matthy king Edward began to ride with banner displayed, and twelue thousand men of armes, against the French king, burning towns and castles wheresoeuer he came. In the first night being very darke, Geoffrey Lord Scrope one of the kings Iustices, led one of the Cardinals, to wit, Bertrand de Mount Fauentine, of the title of our Lady, vpon into an high Tower, shewing him the whole land about toward Fraunce, for the compasse of fiftene leagues, to be in euery place on fire, (saying these words,) Sir, doth not this silken thred wherewith Fraunce is compassed, seme to you to be broken: the Cardinal answering nothing, fell down as dead for sorow and feare.

In this sort King Edward made iourneyes into Fraunce daily, continuing the space of fise weekes, and caused his armie to trauell in such sort, that they destroyed the whole Countrey of Cambay, Tourney, Gernoden, and Landenew, excepting those Cities which were sworn to him, with Churches and Castles. The inhabitants of the Countrey fled, neither was there any man that durst resist his enterprises, although the French King had gathered great armies within the walled Cities, himselfe lying in the strong Towne of Saint Quintines, what time the Babanders had determined to returne home againe, and were entred into their iourney, being forced thereunto, partly by want of victuals, and partly by the coldenesse of Winter which grew on fast.

The French King vnderstanding thereof, began to moue himselfe with his army toward the campe of the King of England, who gladly looking for his coming, called backe againe the Babanders, and hauing receiued Letters from the French king, that he would soyne battell against him, he sent him word backe againe, that he would stay for him thre dayes, wherefore on the fourth day the king looking for the French kings coming, which would come no nerer then two miles off, breaking bridges, and felling of trees, that the King of England might not follow him, he fled to Paris, whereupon King Edward returned by Hononia into Babant, where he continued almost the whole winter.

This thirtieth yeere on the seuenth of September King Edward, at Paris

William dela Poole made knight banneret for his good service to the king.

Record.
This W. was father to Michael Lord Wingham earle of Suffolk and knight of the Garter, who had issue Michael Earle of Suffolk, who died at Warrewick 1415, left issue two sons, Michael earle of Suffolk that died at Agincourt the 3 of May, without issue, and Will. Lord Marques and afterward duke of Suff. beheaded the 26. of May the 6. Decree of the Flemings.

teine in Fraunce, gaue unto William dela Poole for the succour of money frankly by him lent, and freely brought unto him in the coasts of Brabant, so as thereby his honour was preserved, which otherwise was in daunger greatly to haue been embased, to be honoured with the Militarie girdle, appointing him to keepe, and continue the state and honour of a Banneret: and he gaue him the manors of Burfwike, and Skyp, with the appurtenances of two hundred and forty markes, in part of five hundred markes land yearly, more conueniently to maintaine the same state. And 260. markes yearly to be receiued of the customes in the port of the towne of Kingstone, untill he were provided off two hundred and threescore markes land of purely reuenue. Finally, because William had deliuered him, laying his owne goods and lands in gage, for recovering the kings right in Fraunce, the king graunted, that if he recovered the rights of inheritance in Fraunce, he would further within the realme of Fraunce (in some competent place) giue to him and to his heires, a thousand markes sterling by yeere.

In this winter time, King Edward grew into great friendship with the Flemings, who prepared at all times to shewe their selues as good subiects unto him, swearing to doe homage and fealtie, vpon condition that he would call himselfe king of Fraunce: and in token thereof, would from thenceforth giue armes with flourel-de-luces, for otherwise they durst not obey him, for feare of the Popes curse, which was to be laid vpon them, if at any time they rebelled against the king of Fraunce. Wherefore by the counsell of the Flemings, and consent of his noblemen, he agreed thereunto, and tooke vpon him both the name and armes of the king of Fraunce. He also tooke flaunders vnder his gouernment, the people whereof long after in all matters were to him obedient, as vnto the king of Fraunce Conquerour. Touching the title and armes aforesaid, the french king said to certaine Englishmen sent vnto him: Our cousin (quoth he) doth wrongfully beare quartered armes of England and Fraunce, which matter notwithstanding doth not much displease vs, for that he is descended from the weaker side of our kinne, and therefore as being a bachelor, we would be content to graunt him licence to beare part of our armes of Fraunce: but whereas in his seales and letters patents he nameth himselfe as well king of England as of Fraunce, and doth set the first quarter of his armes with leopards, before the quarter of Lilies, it doth grieue vs very much, making apparant to the beholders, that the little Island of England, is to be preferred before the great kingdom of Fraunce. To whom sir Iohn of Shobich knight, made answer, That it was the custome of men in those dayes, to set the title and armes of their progenitors, before the armes and title of the right descending of their mother: and thus of dutie and reason (said he) doth my Lord the king of England preferre his armes.

King Edward being thus busied, he kept his Christmasse at Gaunt: the Mariners of the Cinque Portes, embarked themselves in pinaces and small boats well appointed, who after the feast of S. Hillarie arrived at Bononie vpon the Sea coast, the weather being so cloudie and darke, that they could scarcely be perceiued to be in the hauen: they bent in the lower towne ninetene galleys and foure great shippes, and twentie small boates with all their tackling, and all such houses as were situate nigh to the sea coast, amongst which was one great house full of oares, sayles, weapons, and other necessaries, sufficient to furnish ninetene galleys, and men for them: at the length in a skirmish betwixt the townesmen and the Englishmen, many of the land men were slaine.

About the beginning of Februarie King Edward returned into England, came vnto Gaunt, where the Quene lay in childbed of her fourth sonne named Iohn, he held a Parliament at Westminster, wherein the Temposaltie graunted him euery ninth sheere of Woll, euery ninth Lambe, and euery ninth sheafe of all sortes of coyne, and the Cleargie gaue him a new tenth.

Immediately after Easter, the Carles of Salisburie and Suffolke, being accompanied but with a few men, gaue an assault vnto the Towne of Aile in Flaunders, which Towne was confederate with the French king, but they chasing the Frenchmen too farre within the gates, the Percolices being let fall, they were beset with a multitude of men of armes, and being taken, they were conueyed into France, fettered and shackleed with yron, although they had swoyne to be true prisoners: they were drawne in a cart through the middest of euery citie, towne, village and hamlet, with great shoutes and cries, rayling on them: and at length being brought to the presence of the French king, he would haue most shamefully laine them, had he not been otherwise perswaded by the counsell of the king of Boemia.

The seuenth day of May the king gaue to William Marquesse Juliers, and to the heires of his bodie, the Carledome of Cambridge, with the towne and castle, and twentie poundes by yeare in fee, and created him at Westminster by the girding of a sword, whereof he also made him his charter with the gift of one thousand poundes of yearely rent.

Record.

King Edward kept his Whitsonside at Ipswich, for that he intended from thence to take his passage into Flaunders, but being certified that the French king had sent a great nauie of Spanish shippes, and also the whole fleet of France, to stoppe his passage, he caused his shippes of the Cinque Ports and other to be assembled, so that he had in his fleet great and small two hundred and threescore shippes.

Wherefore on the Thursday before the nativitie of Saint Iohn Baptist, hauing a prosperous wind, he began to sayle, and the next day in the euen of the sayd feast, they escried the French fleet lying in Swine hauen. Wherefore the king caused all his fleet to come to anker.

The next day being the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, early in the morning, the french fleet diuided themselves into three parts, and remoued themselves as it were a mile, approaching towards the kings fleet.

Great fight on the sea, against the French.

Which when the king perceiued, about nine of the clocke, hauing the wind and sunne on his backe, set forward and met his enemies as he would haue wished, wherewithall the whole fleet gaue a terrible shout, and a shoure of arrowes out of long wooden bowes so powred downe on the French men, that thousands were slaine in that meeting, at length they closed and came to hand blowes, with pikes, pole-axes, and swordes, and some threw stones from the toppes of shippes wherewith many were brained.

The greatnesse and height of the Spanish shippes caused many Englishmen to strike many a stroke in vaine. But to be shorte, the French shippes being overcome, and all the men spent of the first part, the Englishmen entred and tooke them.

The French shippes were chayned together in such sort, that they could not be separated one from another, so that a few Englishmen kept that part of the fleet: wherefore they set vpon the second warde, and with great difficulty gaue the charge, which being done, was soner overcome then the first, so that the Frenchmen leauing their shippes, many of them leapt ouer boorde.

The Englishmen hauing thus overcome the first and second part of the fleet, and now hauing night drawing on, partly for want of light, and partly so that they were wearie, they determined to take some rest till the next morning, wherefore that night thirtie shippes of the third crew fledde away, and a great shippe called the James of Diepe, thinking to haue carried away a certaine ship of Sandwich belonging to the Bishop of Canturbury was stayed: for the Gallies so slowly defended themselves by the helpe of the Earle of Huntingdon that they saued themselves, and their ship from the Frenchmen. The fight continued all the night, and in the morning the Poymans being overcome and taken, there were found in the ship aboue foure hundred men slaine. Moreover, the King vnderstanding that thirtie ships were fled, he sent fourtie ships well appointed to followe them, ouer the which he made Iohn Crabbe gouernor: but what god speede he had is not knowne.

In the first company of shippes that were taken they found these conquered shippes, the Denis, the George, the Christopher, and the blacke Corke, all which shippes were taken by Frenchmen at Sluce, and carried into Poymandie.

The number of ships of warre that were taken, was about two hundred and thirtie barges: the number of enemies that were slaine and drowned were aboue five and twentie thousand, and of Englishmen about foure thousand, among whom were foure knights, Sir Thomas Mortimer the Kings cousin, Sir Thomas Latimer his sonne, Sir William Butler of Devizes, and Sir Thomas Poynings.

About the same time the Scots came with a great power into England, burning and spoyling all the Marches by fire and sword, and when they were returning with a great bootie of cattell, the common people set vpon them, tooke their bootie, slew many of them, and tooke more then fourescore Scots of good reputation, whom they kept for ransom, for the which fact the people men of the Marches were highly displeased.

About Lammas certaine French pirates gaue an assault to the Ile of Wight and sodainly entred it, but Sir Peter Russell knight, meeting them with the people of that Ile, put them backe againe, and made them to flee, slaying many of them, in the which skirmish the said knight was wounded whereof he died. These pirats sayled thence toward the coast of Devonshire, and coming to Teignmouth, they set fire on the towne and bent it: from thence they failed toward Plymouth, which towne was so defended, that they could not hurt it, but bent the farmes and faire places high adloping, and toke a knight prisoner, whom they carried with them.

The same yere king Edward besieged Tourney, but upon intreatie made by the French, a truce was taken from Michaelmas till Midsummer, wherefore the king comming to Gaunt in Flaunders, stayed there, looking for money out of England, which came not.

King Edward
besieged Tourney.

King Edward with eight of his men, saying that he would ride abroade for his pleasure, secretly came into Zeland, where taking shippe, after he had sayled thre dayes and thre nights, on S. Andrewes day at night about the Cocke crowing, he entered the Tower of London by water, being waited on by the Earle of Northampton, Nicholas Cantilupo, Reignalde Cobham, Giles de Bello Campo, Iohn de Bello Campo knights, and William Killesby, and Phillip Weston priests: early in the morning he sent for his Chancellour, Treasurour, and Iustices then being at London, and the Bishop of Chichester being his Chancellour, and the Bishop of Conentry his treasurour, he put out of office, minding also to have sent them into Flaunders, to have ben pledges for money he owed there: but the Bishop of Chichester declared unto him what danger might insue to him, by the Canons of the Church: whereupon the king dismissed them out of the Tower: but as concerning the high Iustices, to wit, Iohn Lord Stoner, Robert Lord Willowby, William Lord Scharshell, and especially Nicholas de la Bech, who before that time was Lieutenant of the Tower of London, and Sir Iohn Molens knight, with certaine marchant men, as Iohn Poulney, William Poole, and Richard his brother, and the Chancellours chiefe Clarke, to wit, Maister Iohn de Saint Paul, Michell Wache, Henry Stafford, and certaine of the Archequer, as Maister Iohn Thorpe, with many other moe, the king commaunded to be imprisoned, some in one place, some in an other, neither would he suffer them to be discharged thence, till he were thoroughly pacified of his anger conceived for not sending the money which should have served at the siege of Tourney.

This yere about Christmas, Henry Bishop of Lincolne, and Geoffrey Lord Scrope, chiefe Iusticiar to the king and his chiefe Counseller died at Gaunt.

Also at Candlemas he kept a great iusting at Langley, for the honour of the noble men of Gasconia, which he trained by there in seates of warre. He made Robert de Bourcier knight Lord Chancellour of England, and Robert Parnike knight treasurer, the one to succede the other. Also he sent out Iusticiars that should sit in every shire, to enquire concerning the collectours of the tenths and fiftenth, and of wolles, and to oversee all officers. And because the Citie of London would not suffer that any such officers should sit as Iustices within their Citie as inquisitors of such matters contrary to their liberties, liberties, the King provided that those Justices should hold their Sessions in the Tower of London, to make inquisition of the damages of the Londoners: but because the Londoners would not answer there, untill their liberties were fully confirmed, neither any such confirmation could be had either of the King, or his Chaucellour touching Writtes and Charters in the Tower, there rose thereof such a great tumult, that the Justices appointed there to sit, fained that they would holde no Session, till after Easter. Whereupon the King being highly offended for the said tumult, and desirous to knowe the names of them that had rased it, could not understand but that they were certaine meane persons, who claimed their liberties: whereupon the King being pacified of his troubled minde, forgaue all the offences committed by the Londoners, the Justices breaking vp all their sitting touching the said place.

This yere within the quindene of Easter a parliament was holden at London, wherein the Barres and Nobles of the realme, with the commons requested, that the Charter called Magna Carta, and Carta Foresta, with all other liberties belonging to the Church and kingdome should be obserued, and that the officers and chiefe rulers of the Kings house should be chosen by the pères of the realme, in the parliament: but these petitions the King would not confirme, nor could abide to heare talked of.

About the beginning of the moneth of July, King Edward receiued letters from Lodowike Duke of Banary, vsurper of the Romane Empire, in the which pretending friendship betwixt him and Philip the French King, he signified that those warres which the King of Englande had begun in France, did greatly mislike him, and therefore desired that there should be concord and amitie betwixt the Kings of both realmes, the which to be perfozmed, he offered to bestow some labour, requesting King Edwards letters of authozity thereof to treate and to conclude a truce for one yere or twaine, toward the end of which letter he addeth these wordes: The deputation and lieutenantship which we gaue vnto you, we doe for diuerse and sundry causes reuoke againe. Dated at Frankesford the fourteenth of June in the seuen and twentieth of our raigne, and of our Empire the fourteenth. To the which letters, King Edward wrote an inscription, in sozte as followeth.

This yere Iohn Maluerne, Fellow of Oxial Colledge in Oxfozd, made and finished his booke entituled, The Missons of Pierce Plowman.

King Edward gaue the Earledom of Cambridge to Iohn Lord Benault, uncle to Quene Phillip, and after kept his feast of S. Katherine at Newcastell, and his Chyristmasse also. Untill this time David King of Scots threatned to leuse an armie, and to enter the land, whereupon King Edward entred Scotland, and followed after David, who fled before him beyond the Scottis sea, working and spoling all as he went, except Castles and Barishes, in the which the Scottes together with David their King hidde themselves. And William Mountacute Earle of Salisburie, hauing gotten a great flæte, entred an Iland belonging to Scotland, where most victoriously he conquered it, and the same Ile being called the Ile of Man, the King gaue it to the conquerour frankly and freely to be possessed, and caused him to be called and crowned king of that Ile. Then king Edward returning towards the south parts, kept solemne turneaments at Dunstable, being accompanied with two hundred and thirtie knights.

Will. Mountacute Earle of Salisburie, conquered, and was crowned King of Man.

The same yeare was a Parliament at Westmynster, wherein the Archbishop of Canterbury, was reconciled to the king, before whom the Archbishop swore that although the king by his counsell and consent had done homage to the French king for the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and the Carledome of Foy, to w<sup>ch</sup>, yet he neuer consented thereto as to be any hurt or prejudice to the king, or that by his counsell he might incurre sauour, or seeke to please the French King, but for that present time he thought it best to be done, both for the obtaining of peace, and also for the profite of the king and realme.

Parliament at Westmynster.

After this Parliament the king commanded flozences of golde to be made at the Tower of London, that is to say, the penny of the value of five shillings eight pence, the halfe penny of the value of thre shillings foure pence, a farthing worth twenty pence.

Flozences of golde.

In a Parliament at Westmynster, in the moneth of May, the religious men that were possessours of lands, granted to the king, towards the maintenance of his warre, all their iewels and plate, as well siluer as golde, hoxles, carts and wagons, whereupon the kings treasure was notably enriched.

The same yeare authoritie was giuen to the kings escheaters, to enquire and certifie the Counsell of all such persons, which helde of the king any lands in capite, or by any other fee, to the value of one hundred shillings, and that the names of all such should be enrolled and giuen by for record. Also certaine other were put in authoritie to signifie how many sufficient and able bowmen were in euery shire: also what other sufficient men were able to beare armour for the defence of their Countrey, and to see them practised with such kind of weapon wher in they had best skill: and being thus assembled in all parts of the realme, specially such as were of lawfull age, commaundement was giuen out, that they should be ready at the kings commaundement to fight against their enemies.

A generall summen of the whole realme of England.

King Edward and his nobles perceiving the derogation that was done to the Realme by such reservations, prouisions and collations of benefices, as the Pope practised here in England, wrote to him, requirring, that sith the Churches of England had been founded and endowed by noble and worthy men, to the ende the people might be instructed by men of their owne language, and that hee being so farre off, could not vnderstand the defaultes, yet his predecessours, and he more then had been bled, by diuers reservations, prouisions, and collations made to diuers persons, some strangers, pe<sup>o</sup>ple, and some enemies to the Realme, whereby the money and profits were carried soth, their cures not prouided for, according to the founders minds, they therefore vpon due considerations signified to him, that they could not suffer such enormities any longer, and besought him to reuoke such reseruatiōs, pꝛouisiōs and collatiōs wholy, to auoyde such standers, mischiefes and harmes as might ensue, and that the cures might be committed to persons mēte for the exercises of the same, besēching him further without delay to signifie his intention, sith they meant to bestowe their diligence to remedie the matter, and see that redress might bee had. Given in full Parliament at Westmīnster, the eightēnth of May, in the yeare of our Lord 1343.

Many being called to ayde the King against the Scottes, but not being ready, they contributed their money, where with the King might hire souldiours in place of them that remayned at home. This yeare saith one written booke in French, K. Edward held a great feast at Windsor of 300. knights, and as many Ladies, with great outrage of expences and costs.

King Edward caused to be called together a great many of Artificers, to the Castell of Windsor, and began to build an house which was called the round Table, the floore whereof, from the Center or midde poynt into the compass, was an hundred fote, and the whole Diameter two hundred fote, and the circumference thereof is six hundred fote and three quarters.

The same time Philip de Valois King of France, builded a round Table in his Countrey, to the end that he might allure the men of Warre of Germanie and Italie, and so to keepe them from the King of Englands round Table.

King Edward in succour of John Mountfort Duke of Brytaine, and of his wife and childzen, who then remained in the kings custody, sent the Carles of Northampton, and of Orford, Hugh Spencer, and Richard Talbot knights, and Master William Killesby Clarke, euery one of them hauing vnder them many men of armes and archers, into Brytaine, who entred thereinto, in despite of all their enemies which resisted them, making many conflicts. They tooke as well walled townes as other, with diuers fortresses and castles, both by assault and surrender, by which meanes they had the whole countrey vnder their subiection, conquering till they came to the towne of Mowles, where Charles de Bloys met them with a great army. Therefore in the champaine ground nigh vnto Mowles, the two armies made great and most stout battell, wherein the worthinesse of both sortes did full well appeare: for they fought so stoutly, that in the first conflict it chanced as the like had not beene seene: for the chiefe Captaines, Charles de Bloys, to whome the French King had giuen the Dukedome of that countrey, and William de Bohune Earle of Northampton, who for the defence of the right of John de Mountfort, naturall heire and Duke of that land, the King of England had made a Generall ouer the armie of the Englishmen, fought so long with hand strokes in the fiede that day, that no man but a liar could giue more praise to the one then to the other. Thre times that day they being wearied on both sides, withdrew themselves to take breath, and then fell to it againe with speare and shield, and sword and target: but in the end the right worthy and stout Charles de Bloys, his men fleeing away, was also forced to flee himselfe, whereupon after many slaine on both sides, the victorie sel to the Englishmen.

King Edward sent ouer Henry Earle of Derby, sonne to the Earle of Lancaster his cousin, with more then fise hundred men of armes, amongst whom was the Earle of Penbroke, and Walter de Many, with many Archers into Gascoigne, with Ralph Baron of Stafford Seneschall of Gascoigne, who being come thither, the said Earle made fifty knights of his army, and after many walled towne and castles, making many worthy skirmishes, and at length wonne the Towne of Dagullstone by assault, to the keeping whereof they appoynted Ralph Stafford, after ward they appoynted thre iournepes toward other Townes, as especially to Bigerecke (so called for the strength thereof, and also called the chamber of France) and also to the towne of Saint Iohn de Laruell, and to many other great and strong Townes well fortified, which with great toiles and diuers dangerous assaults they won: where the Earle of Derby and his souldiours vndermining the towers and walles of the said towne, were very soze assaulted by them which defended it.

Thus he conquered cities, to wnes, castles and fortresses, to the number of one hundred and fiftie, bringing a great part of Gascoigne vnder subiection, euen to Tolouse, vnto the which citie he did no damage, neither to the inhabitants thereof, but that he made them wonderfully afraide: as certaine of them tolde me (saith my author) their feare was such, that the religious people were constrained to beare armour, and the Prior of the Carmelite friers of our Lady of Tolouse, hauing a banner of our Lady in golde set in a fiesle of siluer, displayed the same, prouoking thereby many to take armour.

About the second Sunday in Lent, the earles being fully fraught with booty, prisoners, gold and siluer, they returned towards Burdeaur, where Iohn de Valois, eldest sonne to the French king, being accompanied with a great number of hyed Dutch souldiours, besieged the towne of Agnolwne, and the capitaines thereof the Earle of Stafford and other, so entrenched the same towne, that without great daunger the Englishmen could haue no acesse vnto them, but the Earle of Derby beate away them that besieged the citie, and elsowes new victualled the same, notwithstanding they were not able to raise the siege, because they had so entrenched themselues without the towne, who refusing to fight in the field, would answere, that they came not to pitch a fiesle, but to besiege a towne, wherefoze they continued the same siege vntill the decollation of Saint Iohn, but vnderstanding then that the King of England chased his father Philip very soze to Cressie, and fearing that he should come very late to the ayde of his father, he gaue vp the siege, setting all his tents on fire, and fled in the darke, but the Earle of Stafford with his powre pursued them, cut off their taile, toke a great many of their hozses, and returned.

After this certaine bow-men are mustered in England, appoynted to be sent ouer sea, who conuning ouer, are layde in garrison for defence of the country. Also twentie thousand sackes of wooll are graunted to the King.

Moreouer, Geoffrey de Harecourt a poorman, came to the King requiring ayde against the French King, who wrongfullie with helde his landes from

Burie, Bishop of Durham deceased. Tho-

field succeeded.

Richard de Bury deceased at Auckland, when hee had sate Bishoppe of Durham eleuen yeeres, two moneths, and odde dayes, and was buried at Durham, unto whome succeeded Thomas of Hatfield the Kings secre- tary, by meanes of the Kings letters to the Pope: And when certaine of the Cardinales saide, that the saide Thomas was a light person, and a lay man: the Pope answered, truly, if the King of England at this time had made his request for an asse, hee should haue obtained it. But Richard Bury is somewhat to bee remembred for example to other, hee was borne nere Saint Edmundsbury, by his father Sir Richard Angar- uill Knight, and his uncle Sir Iohn Willowby his gouernour he was first set to Grammar schole, and after sent to Oxford, from whence hee was called to teach Edward of Mundlefoze then Prince: after ward this Richard was made principall receiuer to Edward the second in Gascoigne, at such time as yong Edward with his mother fledde to Paris, whose expences beginning to faile, the said Richard came to them priuily with a great summe of money, for y<sup>e</sup> which cause he was pursued to Paris where he lay hid in a steple by the space of seuen dayes. After this he was made Cofferer to Edward the third, then treasurer of the Wardrobe, then clearke of the priuie scale by the space of five yeeres, in the which time, twice he went to Pope Iohn. In the sixe and fortyeth yeere of his age he was consecrated Bishop of Durham, then was he made Treasurer of England, and after Chancellour, since the which time he was sent thise to the French King to claime the kingdome of France, and af- ter that, to Antwerpe and other places in Brabant in embassage by the space of nine yeeres, he was greatly delighted in the company of Clearkes, and had alwayes many of them in his family, among whom were Thomas Bradwar- dine, after ward Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard fitz Ralph Archbishop of Armacham, Walter Burley, Iohn Mandir, Robert Holcot, Richard Kilwington, all of them doctozs of diuinitie, Richard Wentworth or Benworth Bishop of London, and Walter Segraue Bishop of Chichester euery day at his table, he was accustomed to haue some reading: and after dinner daily he would haue disputation with his priuate clearkes, and other of his house, except some by- gent cause had let him. At other times he was occupied, either in seruice of God, or at his booke, weekly he bestowed for the reliefe of the poore eight quarters of wheate made into bread, besides the ordinary fragments of his house. Moreover, in comming or going from Newcastle to Durham, he be- stowed sometimes twelue markes in almes, from Durham to Stockton eight markes, from Durham to Auckland five markes, from Durham to Mid- dleham an hundred shillings, &c. He was so delighted in booke, that he had more (as was thought) then all the Bishops of England besides, he bestowed many rich ornaments on the Church of Durham, he builded an hall or house in Oxford, induing it with reuenues needefull for his schollers. The same yere died Henry Carle of Lancaster, father to Henry Carle of Darby, and was buried at Leicester, in the monastery of canons, the King and both the olde and yong Quenes being present, with Archbishops, Bishops, Carles and Barons, in manner of all the land, whose sonne was then in Galcoine doing chivalrous acts.

This yere the Scots, to the number of thirtie thousand, William Douglas being their leader, entred into Westmerland, and byent Carleile, Penrith, with many other towines, wherefore the Bishop of Carleile, with Thomas Lucy, Robert Ogle, and a great number, compassed them in the night season, and with lights and noise so disquieted them, that they neuer durst goe out for victualles, nor giue their bodies to sleepe, but at the last Alexander Stragan stoutely prepared to goe out for victualles, whom the Bishop and Robert Ogle mette, and with a speare thrust him through the body, so that the Scots were sone after overcome and slaine.

An. reg. 20.

King Edward prepared to make a voyage into Normandy, his navy being ready to transport him from Portsmouth and Worcester, with the Carles of Portsmouth, Arundell, Warwike, Harecourt, Huntingdon, Orenford, and Suffolke, the Bishop of Durham, and Master William Killesby cleerke, euery one of these leading a great army of souldiours well appointed, were imbarqued, and waited for the winde, from the first of June, to the fift of July, and then hauing a god winde, they beganne to make saie with the number of one thousand shippes of burthen and pinaces, and on the thirteenth day of July, they landed at Hogges in Normandy, where on the shoare of the Sea, King Edward made his eldest sonne Knight, and also Prince of Wales, and immediately the Prince made knights, Mortimere, Montacute, Rose, and other.

The night following King Edward lodged in Percels. where he stayed five dayes, during which time, all the Countrey, with the Towne of Barbelete, was by his men consumed with fire. From thence they departed to Teloigus, which they set on fire: then they went to Saint combe Mount, which is nigh the sea, and to Sarantam, thence to Serius, and to Saint Lewes, passing along vnto the towne of Tournay, wasting all with fire, and that night the King lodged at Carmalin, then to Gryn, being a religious house belonging belonging vnto Cane, leauing nothing behind them vnspoyled.

After ward they made an assault, and entred the City of Cane, making their entrance by a bridge which was strongly defended.

There was slaine an hundred and thre and fourtie knights, among the which was taken the Carles of Clewe, and Camberlinde Tankerull, with diuers other captaines, and of them of the Citie, were slaine aboue one thousand thre hundred.

At this Citie the armie remained fure dayes, and the spoile thereof they sold to those mariners which followed the coast as the King went. Then they went to the monasterie in the Towne of Toward, a verie strong thing, and well defended. After ward, they came vnto Argons by night, burning still as they went, till they came to the Citie of Licens, where they found the Cardinalles of Clarimount, and of Paples, and one archbishop, who offered the King a treatie of peace, and there the King continued thre dayes, refusing to treate of peace. Then they went to Lascetnoland, and to the Towne of Bzine, and lodged at Pelw Burge, and after at Selesse vpon Segane, and there the Welchmen swamme thzough the water of Segan, and being resisted by the inhabitants, they slewe many of them. Then they passed nigh to the towne and Castell of Pount Darch, being strong places, and not assaultable. This night he lodged at Lury vpon Segan, nigh vnto the good Towne of Louars, which they did burne. After, they passed by the towne and castell of Gallon, which they toke, and bzent, and lodged at Lingeue, which is nigh the good towne and Castle of Vernon, which they touched not, and there they first entred into Fraunce, and the same night they bzent the Castell of Roche Blanch, which standeth on the other side of Segan, and lodged at Fremble vpon Segan. After that they passed by the Towne of Maunt, lodging that night at Dpozne. On the next day they passed to Frigmas, and the next day to the good towne of Dacie, where being a bridge to passe ouer the riuer of Segan, the French had spoyled it, but the King caused it to be redified: and the nexte day they came to Annas, where were thre Armies appointed to keepe the King from passing that way: but he slew thre hundred of them at the first charge, put the residue to flight, and spoyled their tentes, burning thre hundred and two cartes and wagons laden with crossebowes, quarrels, armour and victualles: the King staying there two dayes, they went to Grefle nigh vnto Pountops, then to Antell: the next day they passed by the Citie of Wenneps, which they touched not, and so by Trosolours at the water of Some, where they lodged.

The next day they wanne the towne of Pops, and bzent the castell. From thence they went to Aregnus, then to Achen, where they lodged. The nexte day they came to Poell vpon the sea side, the French men of Dabaille and the countrey came to the swordes side to hinder their passage, with whom the King had a soze conflict, but the enemies were put to the worse, and moze then two thousand slaine, and the Towne of Croptoy taken and bzent, and aboue thre hundred Germaines slaine.

The nexte day they followed the King on the riuer of Some, and on the banks banks side (where the King with his hoste were lodged) came traueling Philip de Valoys the French King, with the Kings of Boheme and Malegre, leading an armie of men innumerable, diuided into eight great battelles. King Edward sent to the French King, offering him free passage ouer the forde, if he would come and chouse a place apt to fight a field in, but this Phillip went to another place of passage.

Th. dela More.

On the morrow King Edward remoued to Cressfield, where the armie of the French King met him. The King therefore set his sonne the Prince of Wales to gouerne the barward. The middle warde the earle of Porthampton. The thirde he tooke to guide himselfe.

Battell of Cressy.

The armie of the Frenchmen were deuided into nine troupes. The barward was committed to the King of Boheme. The French King commaunded his banner called Milisaine to be set vp, after which time it was not lawful vnder paine of death to take any man to saue his life.

The french banner of milisaine signified no mercie more the fire in oile.

This banner, that it might differ from his standert, had in it lillies of gold very broad.

On the other side, King Edward cammanded his banner to be erected of the dragon, which signified fiercenesse and cruelty to be turned against the lillies.

These armies being thus appointed, stode in the fiede from one of the clocke vntill the euening. About the Sunne setting, after the armies had iusted, they beganne by the sound of Trumpets to giue signe of battaile, but they themselves felt the force of the English Archers, and as for their quarrels, they fell short a great way. Moreouer, their footemen being placed among their owne horsemen, were by them (when they were gauled with the English shotte of arrowes) ouerrunne and troden vpon, that a great outcry was made as it were to the starres, and the whole forme of the array was broken, and they fighting with the English armed men, are beaten downe with polares.

In this so terrible bickering, the Prince of Wales being then but fiftenth yeeres old, shewed his wonderfull towardnesse, laying on very hotely with speare and shelde. This battell dured thre partes of the night, in the which time the Frenchmen gaue fve great assaults against our men, but at the length they being conquered, ran away.

On the morrow, there came foure armies of fresh souldiours to the French side, and making semblance as though their part had suffered no harme, they came against the Englishmen, and gaue them a fresh battell. On the other side, the Englishmen withstood them very stoutely, and after a sharpe conflict they forced their foes to flie, and in chasing of them together with them that were slaine in the conflict, they slewe thre thousand men in the said two dayes. There were slaine in the battaile of Cressie, the Kings of Boheme and of Malozica, the Archbishop of Zantinus, the Bishop of Poypone, the Dukes of Lozaine & Bourbon, the Carles of Alanfon, Harcourt, Aymarle, Sauoy, Poiss, Mountbilliard, Piuars, and of Flanders, with the grand Prior of the hospitall of Fraunce, and 4000. men of armes, beside common souldiours without number.

The third day after, king Edward passed by the Abbey of Mountney, and the next day they came to the town of Mountney, & from thence to the Punnwhere they stayed two dayes, and from thence they came to Calceis, which presently they entrenched to besiege, being the fourth day of September.

The french king in this meane time sent a number of Genowayes, and other hired foaldicours, vnto David king of Scots, earnestly requesting him that he would inuade England with all his foze: wherefore about the 7. of October, he with a mighty power entred England, passing along by Ber-wikke, which was strongly defended by the Englishmen, and so ranging over the forest of Ainelwikke, they wonne a certaine mannour place called Luben, belonging to the Lord Walter Wake, who yelded himselfe on condition to be ransomed, where (Selby a knight being desirous by law of armes to saue his life) he was taken, which when it was known to David, he commanded him to be slaine: but Selby intreated for him, that he might be brought alieue to the presence of David, who hauing obtained his request, he falleth downe before David, requesting his life for ransome, but he was againe adiudged to die. The malice of the tyrant was such, that he commanded two of the children of the poore knight to be strangled in sight of their father, and afterwards himselfe being almost madde for sorrow, was beheaded.

Battell of Durham.

From thence the Scots passed forward, waiking along the Countrey, wherein were many farmes belonging to the monasterie of Durham, & com-ming within two miles of Durham, they tooke certaine of the Monks, which they kept prisoners, for their ransome, making covenant with the residue for a certaine summe of money and cozne to redeme their mannours from spoyling. The Englishmen of the marches standing before the face of the enemye, William de la Zouch, Archbishop of Yorke, vicegerent to the king in the marches, calling together the bishop of Carleile, the Earle of Anguise, the Lord Mowbray, the Lord Henry Percy, the Lord Ralph Neuell, Ralph Hastings, with all their ayde, together with the archers of Lancashire, went towards the armie of the Scots, and on the euen of Saint Luke, met them at a place called Bewze Parke, nere Newils Crosse. The Scottissh nation not accustomed to flee, withstood them stoutely, and hauing head-pieces on their heads, and targets on their armes, preasing sore vpon the Englishmen, they abode the brunt of the archers: but the men of armes which were in the forefronts, gaue their enemies many deadly wounds. The Marshall of the Scottes, Earle Parike, who had the charge of the rereward, when he perceiued his men to be beaten downe, he fled away with other that were priuie to his cowardlines: he being fled, the residue of the Scottes continuing faithfully with their king, stood about him like a round Tower, keeping him in the middle, who so continued till there was scarce fortie of them left alieue, of the which not one of them could escape a way.

At length David their king valiantly fighting and sore hurt, an Esquire of Northumberland, named Iohn Copland toke him, who with eight of his seruants rode strait out of the field with the king, and so rode fiftene leagues from

from that place, to a castle called Dyalus, the residue about him being taken or slaine, the Englishmen pursued the chase after them which were fled, slay-ing and taking them as farre as Bndihow and Corbridge. In this great battell were taken David de Bruse king of Scottes, the Earle of Mentife, the Earle of Fife, the Lord Paleolin Flemming, the Earle Warton, William Dowglas, William de Lemington, Walter de Halliburton, John Dowglas, Da-uid de Anade, John de Saint Clere, William Mowbray, David firz Robert, William de Ramsey, Adam Moygne, John Steward, Roger de Kirkpatrick, John Hume, and William Morrey Knights, James Sudelshoure, James Loren, Henry Delker Baronets. There were slaine in this battell the Earle of Morise, the Earle of Straterne, also Alexander Stragy, John de Halliburton, Henry de Ramly, Naso de Ramly, Adam Nilkenfon, Thomas Boid, John Stiward, Allan
Stiward, David de la Hay, Edward Keth, John Crawford, John de Kinfefey, Philip de Maldren, Henry Ramsey, Alexander Morey, Humfrey de Bois, Gilbert Inchmarton, Robert Maltallent, and his brother Humfrey Kirkepatrick, John Strange, and Patrike Hearing Knights. There were many slaine in the chase, but there were no more coate armours found in the maine battell then we haue reckened.

This battell was fought on the seuenteenth of October. The prisoners were conueyed to London about Christmasse, David le Bruse except, which might not tranell by reason of two deadly wounds in his head with arrowes, but the second of Januarie he was brought by, and conueyed from Westminster to the Tower of London, in sight of all the people, and there lodged in the blacke noke of the sayd Tower, nere to the Constables guard, there to be kept. About the feast of S. Mathie the Apostle, the Earle of Fife was at Londyalyn, headed and quartered, his head set on London Bridge, his quarters set by in foure parts of the Realme.

John Copland, that toke David de Bruse king of Scottes at the battell of Durham (so so is it called in the Record) for his seruice, king Edward made him a banneret, and gaue him for his maintenance in that state five hundred pounds by yeare, after this manner, to wit, foure hundred poundes out of the custome of the Citie of London, and one hundred pounds out of his custome of the Towne of Barwike vpon Twide, untill such time as five hundred pound lands by yeare were giuen to him and his heires for euer. And more for his good seruice with one hundred men of armes, one hundred pound the yere, out of the custome of the kings port of Newcastle vpon Tyne, till the said John had, provided for him and his heires one hundred pound land by yere.

Chepstow in Wales, & Dover in Kent, built by the Romans.

Chepstow in Weredocia, or South Wales, and the Castle of Dover in Kent, what time he had conquered Bytaine (as saith mine author,) King Edward cast a ditch about his campe, and laide his naule of ships against Cales haven, to the intent that the Frenchmen should make no invasions upon his shoulours, neither they within receive any victuals by water. The Norman pirates at sundry times took 15. of his ships, whereof some of them they carried away for their owne occupying, the other they bent, and sir Thomas Haclut, with sir William Borton knights, as they were sailing into England, were taken prisoners on the sea. King Edward having fortified the siege, lay without giving any assault, knowing that it was not possible to fight with his enemies without great losse of men, considering the depth of the ditches, and height of the walles: neither would he erect any engines against the towne, for there wanted firme ground whereupon to place them. Besides that, if he should beate downe the walles, yet were the ditches so deepe, and full of salte water let in on every side, that they were able to withstand all the world, with little strength and defence. On that side of the towne on which the Bollomenes were wont to victuall Cales, that is along on the Sea side, and especially when the shippes could not be suffered to passe by Sea, but along the shoare with small boates, the Earle of Portsmouth made a rampire, wherewith he kept away, & beat backe such boates & after ward when the Admirall of France had purposed to come with his ships of war to fight against our English ships that lay at the siege, thinking, y in the meane time, whilest they were in fighting, the small boates should passe to Cales with victuals, the said Earle of Portsmouth meeting with him valiantly, put him to flight.

This siege during in such sort, from the feast of the Nativite of our Lady, all the whole winter, with a great part of the summer, and still waring stronger and stronger. On monday next before the feast of Saint James, the French King came to the castle of Gynnes, with his eldest sonne John, and the Kings sonne of Boheme: and a great power, to have remoued the siege from Cales. Also the Emperour (promising by othe, that he would remoue the siege either by warre or peace, or at the least, he would victuall them that were besieged) came with his army towards the English campe, and lodged scarce a mile from thence, requesting by messengers a treatie of peace. He sent the Duke of Detenes, and the Earles of Bulone and Parminake, who parling with the Duke of Lancaster, the Earles of Portsmouth and Huntington, touching a truce, could not obtaine their consent, whereupon after they had exercised a little warlike iusting, they returned to their Tents. The second day following, the French king offered the king of England a day of battell, which the king on certaine conditions accepted very gladly. In the meane season, they which were besieged, made known their state to the French king by signes and tokens, for at his first coming, they within the towne set up his ancient on the chieffest tower of the castle, and also they set out banners of the Dukes and Earles of France, and a little after the shutting in of the evening, they made a great light on the top of one of the highest towers, which was towards the army of the Frenchmen, & therewithal they made a great great shoute and noyse with trumpets and drummes. The second night they made the like, but somewhat lesse. The third night a very small fire, giuing forth therewith a sorrowfull voyce, signifying thereby that their strength touching the keeping of the Towne, was quite spent and done. And the same night they toke in all their flags and ancientes, except their standart. At the last, the day of battell drew on, against which time, there came out of England and Dutchland, toward the helpe of King Edward 17000. fighting men, whereupon the French King betimes in the morning of the second daye of August, making fire in his tents, fledde, whose taile the Duke of Lancaster and Earle of Northampton cutting off, they slewe and toke many of them.

When they of Calais perceiued this, they toke their standart downe, and with great sorrow cast it from the Tower, downe into the ditch, and on the Saturday following, Iohn de Vienna their Captaine, a man very skillfull in warlike affayres, opening the gates of the Towne, came out to the King of England, sitting on a little nagge, for that hee being lame on his fete could not well goe, with an halter about his necke, with the other burgessees and souldiours following on fote, bare headed, and bare footed, hauing halters about their neckes.

The Captaine comming thus befoze the King, offered him a warlike sword, as vnto the chiefeest Prince of armes amongst all Christian Kings, and as one that had taken that Towne from the mightiest Christian King by noble chualry. Then he deliuered to him the keyes of the towne. Thirdly, he requesteth of him pitie, asked pardon, and deliuered him the sword of peace, wherewith he should giue right iudgement, spare and forbear the humble and lowly, and chasten the proude hearted.

The King receiuing that which was offered him, sent the Captaine with fiftene knights, and as many Burgessees into England, enriching them with large gifts. The common sort of people, and such as he found in the Towne, being somewhat refreshed with the Kings almes, he commaunded to be safe conducted to the castle of Guisnes.

Guisnes.

After the taking of the towne of Calais, the souldiers at the kings commandement toke the Panoz of Parks and of Hop, and with great difficulty: they built in them foyts, setting in order where walles wanted, hoggesheads filled with stones against the enemies, whilest the walles were a building within. Immediately after the taking of Calais, there began in those parts a general pestilence of the aire, comming from the east parts, into many other parts of the world, whereupon it came to passe, that a great multitude of people dyed. This pestilence gaue occasion that certaine Cardinals were sent on the behalfe of the French King, to craue a truce from that time, vnto the feast of Saint Barnabe next following, which was agreed vpon on the eight and twenty of September.

Commodities
of peace.

This peace being made, it seemed through England as a new sommer had followed, because of the plentie of all things, for there was no woman of any name, but she had some of the pyses of Cane and Caleis, or of other cities beyond the Seas, whereof the matrones being proud, did bragge in French matrones apparell.

At the feast of Easter, James Dowglas, who was taken at Durham in the warres, and brought to London with the king of Scottes, was licenced to depart home againe, swearing to the king peace and fealtie, who after warde liuing peaceably in the Marches, and being requested by William Dowglas to ride a hunting with him, was by him comming behind his backe most traitterously slaine.

After Easter, the king held a councell, wherein it was decreed that none of his seruants should take by any victuals of any man against his will, nor but that he payd for it readie money, upon paine to bee punished and banished the court, Richard Talbot high steward of the kings house being appointed to see execution of that proclamation.

The Earle of Pents was racked, arreigned, and conuicted, for that contrary to his faith and homage sworn to the king of England, he did againe beare armes against him, and for that fact he was drawne, hanged, and quartered. To this councell came two Carles, and two clearkes sent from the Princes electors, signifying that their election was made to the king, for the dignitie of the kingdome of Ainaine. These messengers the king receiued with due honoz, but answered them, that he would not take so greate honour upon his shoulders, untill he had the crowne of France, due vnto him, in peaceable possession.

Lincolne.

A little after Easter, there were great Justings holden at Lincolne by the Duke of Lancaster, where were present many Ladies, with the Countesse, and also certaine messengers sent from the king of Spaine, for the lady Iane daughter to the king, that should be married to their master the kings sonne, whome her husband meeting, she died of the great pestilence, so that he followed her to the grave.

The same yeere, R. Edward with his eldest sonne the Earle of Marwike, and the bishop of Winchest. went to Caleis, from whence the king sent the Duke of Lancaster to Donemere, to receiue in his behalfe fealtie and homage of the earle of Flanders, which thing was by the said earle performed. Great Pestilence.

There began amongst the East Indians and Tartarians a certaine pestilence, which at length waied so general, infecting the middle regio of the ayre so greatly, that it destroyed the Saracens, Turks, Syzians, Palestinians, & the the Grecians, with a wonderfull, or rather incredible death, in so much that those peoples being exceedingly dismayed with the terrour therof, consulted amongst themselves, & thought it good to receiue the Christian faith & Sacraments, for they had intelligence that the Christians which dwelt on this side the Greekish sea, were not so greatly (more then common custome was) troubled with sickness and mortallitie. At length this terrible slaughter passed o-uer into those Countries which are on this side the Alpes, and from thence to the partes of Fraunce, which are called Hesperia, and so by order along into Germany and Dutchland. And the seventh yere after it began, it came into England, and first began in the towne and ports lonyng on the Sea coasts, in Dorsetshire, where, euen as in other Countries, it made the Country quite void of inhabitants, so that there were almost none left alive.

From thence it passed into Devonshire, and Somersetshire, euen vnto Bristow, and raged in such sort, that the Gloucestershire-men would not suffer the Bishop-men to haue any accesse vnto them, or into their Countrey by any meanes: but at length it came to Gloucester, yea and to Oxford, and London, and finally it spred ouer all England, and so wasted & spoyled the people, that scarce the tenth person of all sorts was left alive: when Church-yards were not sufficient and large ynough to bury their dead in, they chose certayne fields appointed for that purpose.

Gualter Mayny, Lord of Mayny, borne in Cambray, who serued in company of Henry Duke of Lancaster in his great acts of Gascoine and Guisen, after this time made knight of the Garter in England, hauing a respect to the danger that might fall in time of this Pestilence then begunne in England, if the Churches & Church-yards in London might not suffice to burie the multitude, he purchased a pce of ground called Spittle Croft (for that it belonged to the Paster and brethren of S. Bartholomewes Spittle) containing 13. acres and a rodde, without the barres of West Smithfield, & caused the same to be enclosed, and dedicated by Ralph Bishop of London, in the which place in the yere following, was buried more then fiftie thousand persons, as is affirmed by the kings Charters which I haue seene, and also by an inscription fixed on a stone crosse in the same place And in memorie therof, the same Gualter Mayny caused vpon the same ground a Chappell to be builded, & after founded the same to be an house of Charter-house Monkes, in the yere. 1371.

Also about the same time, one Iohn Cory procured of Nicholas Bp: of the Church of the Holy Trinitie neere vnto Aldgate, one toft of ground neere vnto East Smithfield, for the buriall of them that died, that it might be called the Church-yard of the holy Trinitie: which ground he caused to be enclosed, and dedicated by Ralph Stratford Bishop of London, in the which place King Edward the third, by consent of the said Bp: and Couent, founded the abbey of S. Mary of Grace in the yere 1359. placing therin an Abbot and Monke of the order of Cisteraux, which were white monks, and named the place Eastminster.

There few noble men died, among whom departed John Montgomery, and his Ladie: the Lord Cliftesle Captaine of Calets died at Calets, and was buried in the white Friers at London. Of the common people, together with Religious and Clerkes, there died an innumerable sort, for no man but God onely knew how many. There died from the first of Januarie, to the first of July, in the Citie of Northwich 57104. persons, besides Ecclesiasticall Beneficiaries and Dominikes. There was buried in the Church and Church-yard of Parnmouth, in one yeere 7052. men and women, before which time the personage there was worth 700. markes by yeere, and afterwarde was scarce worth forty pound the yeere. This note was certified to King Henry the seventh in the 22. of his raigne, & the same is written on the gates of the Church of Parnmouth. This great pestilence began at London about the feast of All Saints, in the yeere 1348. That time this pestilence had wasted all England, the Scots greatly reioycing, mocked and swore oft times by the vile death of the Englishmen: but the sword of Gods wrath, due and consumed the Scots in no lesse numbers, then it did the other. It also wasted the Welsh men, and within a while passed over into Ireland, where it destroyed a great number of English people that dwelt there, but such as were right Irishmen bozne, that dwelt in the hilly countries, it scarcely touched, so that few of them died therof. This plague continued sometime in one place, sometime in another, untill the yeere of our Lord 1357. the same yeere for a truce or finall peace to be concluded, the Bishop of Northwich, the Earle of Northampton, the Earle of Stafford, Richard Talbot, Walter Mayny knights, sailed over the Sea into France, whom the Frenchmen met peaceably, but they would not agree to a final peace, unlesse that Calets were restored to them againe, which would not be graunted: and the truce which was taken for a yeere was so continued. But the Earle of Flanders, who would not in any case receive conditions of peace, unlesse the French king were quite forsaken, notwithstanding his soleimne oath, not long after entred into Flanders with a great power of Frenchmen, burning & killing where ever he came: but the people of the countrey with a few Englishmen withstood him stoutly, and gaue him a sore skirmish, in the which, beside that many Frenchmen were slain, the earle himselfe was forced to flie, for the which worthy acte, many knightes were made, amongst the which was John de Elebert, an Englishman.

In the feast of the Patience of S. John, the Quene was purfied at Windsor, where were soleimne Iusts, and running at the tilt, at the which, David king of Scots was present, and the Earle of Glouc, the Lord Tankerull, Lord Charles de Valois, and many other strangers captives, who by the kings licence were permitted to runne also at the tilt, at the which pastime the prize of the field was adjudged to the Earle of Glouc. After in Sommer season, these strangers passed their time in hunting, in the companie of the king, and other nobles of the Realme, at Claringdon in Wiltshirenigh Salisbury, and in diuers other forests.

Whiles the king was thus occupied, the Frenchmen notwithstanding the truce, entred the marches of Britaine, but the sonnes of Sabater, with a few other, who went out a foraging, toke Thomas Dagworth knight, a man of great experience, who but with a few men, to meet sixteen armed men, entred the wood against these robbers, & inuaded them, slaying to the number of three hundred, but at the length being stricken five times in y face with quarels, al his men being first slain, he himself was thrust through y body with a sword.

About the feast of Saint Michael, more then 120. persons of Scotland, and Holland, coming thorough Flaunders vnto London, sometime in the Church of Saint Paul, sometime in other places of the citie, twice in the day, in the sight of all people, from the loynes, vnto the heeles, couered in linnen cloth, all the rest of their bodies being bare, hauing on their heads hats with red crosses before and behind, every one in their right hands a whip with three cords, ech cord hauing a knot in the middest, beate themselves on their bare bloudie bodies going in procession, some of them singing in their owne language, all the other answering them.

The same yere the Earle of Lancaster, the Barons of Stafford & Grey, Roche, also the heires of the Lords Percy and Neuell, and the Lord Furniwall with Bartholmew Burwash, and diuers other, about the feast of all Saintes, passed ouer sea into Gascoigne, to delay the furious wyrore that Iohn de Valois sonne to the French king had made in that Dukedome, greatly spoyling and wasting the same. Also the kings Counsell ordained, that none of the kings iurices during the time of their offices, should receiue any fee, gift, or reward of any man, except it were of the king himselfe.

Also this yere in the Countie of Wyford, nigh vnto a Towne called Chipping Norton, there was found a serpent hauing two heads, and faces like two men, one being shaped after the new tyze of that time: another after the manner of the old attire, and it had great wings, after the manner of a flinder-mouse or Bat. Thomas Bradwarden Archbishoppe of Canterburie deceased, Simon Islip succeeded.

About the feast of All Saints, king Edward being accompanied with the Carles of Lancaster, and suffolke, and diuers others, passed ouer the seas into Flaunders, and thence leading his armie towards Fraunce, the Frenchmen made meanes vnto him to renewe their truce: and now the Earle of Flaunders submitted himselfe the third time vnto the kings mercie & dominion. Then the king returning toward England, to solemnizate the translation of Saint Thomas the Confessor and Bishop of Hereford, did with his presence and Nobilitie honor the same, to the great expences of Nicholas Cantulupus Baron, and cousin to the said Saint Thomas: during which feast and solemnitie, it was signified to the king by the Secretaries of Emericus of Padua, who was a feed man to the king of England, that on the fourteenth day of Ianuarie next coming, Geoffrey Charney knight, and many other Frenchmen should be receiued into Caleis, vnto whom the said towne was selde by the said Emericus: but the Towne being presently rescued by king Edward, the said Emericus of Padua with other Wenoways continued in Caleis, being maintained there at the costs of the French king against the king of England, when he besieged it, who also after the peelding of it to the king of England, being pardoned both of life and limme, from thence forth continued and dwelt as a seed man of the kings in the said Towne for the defence thereof. At that time the said Geoffrey was Lord of Patas, a man more skilful in warfare then any French man in Fraunce. Wherefore he was greatly esteemed, euen to the time of his death. This craftie deuiler induoured by his letters, wherein hee made promise of large giftes of gold, and other sophisticall perswasions, quite to subuert the faith and loyaltie of the said Emericus.

Finally, this craftie deuiler agreed with this false man, that for twentie thousand French crownes he should let in the French men to the Towne, and as much as lay in him, deliuer vp to the French men both the Towne and Castle. This bargaine being most traiterously made, by oath and breaking of the Sacrament betwixt them, yet at this notwithstanding, he wrote letters vnto the king touching the state of the whole matter, but very priuily, how that he was ready to shew friendship to the French men, yet meaning to make frustrate their purpose, where by they should be conuicted of breaking the truce, and also many of them should bee taken to bee ransomed, wherefore King Edward speedily passed ouer, being accompanied with his eldest sonne, the Earle of March, and a few other, comming befoze the time appointed for the peelding of the Towne, certaine daies. Wherefore being come to Caleis, hee laid certaine men of armes within the Trenches which were betwixt the outter gate and the inner parte of the Castle, building a thinne and slender Wall befoze them newly set vp, not made of plasse, but of counter-faite matter, which ioyned to the other Wall, craftily denised and made like the olde woork, so that no man would iudge that any were enclosed therein.

Also hee caused the mainepostes of the drawe bridge to bee sawed almost in sunder, yet in such sorte, that armed horse-men might ride over it: and for the purpose he had a great stone, which was laid vp in a hole made in so: m of an arch, being in the se: repart of the Tower hanging over the Bridge, in which he appointed a faithfull Souldier should bee in due time to throwe downe the said stone vpon the Bridge, that with the fall thereof, the Bridge being halfe cut in two, should bee broken in sunder, and so that hole where the stone was laid, should bee wrought in such sort, that hee within shoulde perceiue through the hole how many did enter in: s: we were made priuile to this practise, neither did many know of the kings presence or of the Prince of Wales, who when they had wrought this feate, secretly conueied themselves into the Towne.

The day befoze the time of deliuerie of this Towne, Geoffrey Cherney sent fiftene of his faithfullest men with the greater parte of the golde which was to be payde, who should also trie the faith of Emericus, and the order of the Castle, who searching euerie where, in euerie Tower and corner which they could finde open, could perceiue nothing contrarie to their liking, whereupon on the next day in the morning, they set vp the French flaggs vnder the highest Tower of the Castle, and the ancients also of Geoffrey, and of other Lords vpon other Towers and places. Then the people

ple of the Towne who kept common watch and ward, not knowing of this secrete deuise, were greatly terrified therewith, inso much that they taking weapon in hand, began to giue a charge against the Castell: by and by the French men who had entred the day befoze, toke Thomas Kingstone, then slaying away, quite ignozant of that which was deuised, and sozeably they set him in the stocks. When certaine of them being sent out to the French men their companions and masters, who lay without in ambushes shewed them the ancients and standard set by, and all to be well, euen as they would haue it, hastening them sozward to come to the defence of the Castle, against the townes men: wherfoze they rising from their lurking places, advanced themselves in pride and bragging, and came by heapes in at the gates of the Castle. The townes men perceiuing this, had much adoe to sozbear their hands from them, had not their chiefe leaders withdzawen them from it, least some danger should haue happened to them that lay hid: by and by those that lay hid closed vnder the arches of the walles, prepared themselves to breake out vpon their enemies. In like sozt also he that with the great stone was shut vp in þe hole, after that he saw so many entred in, esteeming that his fellows were sufficient to ouerthrow them, with that great stone put to his custodie he brake the draw brydge, by the which the enemies had entred in, but being once in could not goe that way out againe: when the stone was thus downe, and had discharged the thing soz the which it was laid by, and the French men deceived by that pollicie, they were enclosed safe ynough. At the noyse of this stone and the brydge that brake, these armed men of whom befoze I spake, breaking downe their counterfaite wall, behinde the which all the deceite was hid, they presently set themselves in order to inuade the French men, bitten to a bitter breakfast. The conflict was sharpe soz a good season, but at the length the enemies being ouercom, yeilded themselves to the pleasure of the Conquerours. They which were without and had not entred, as sone as they perceiued their companions to be deceived, fled, after whom the King with scarce fiftene men of armes and as many archers folloved apace, the runnawayes not knowing what companie would folloze them: many in this chase were wearied, and many mo slaine, and in a small tyme the King ouercame daungerous and great labours: but at length, when it was vnderstood by them that fled, how few there were that chased them, fourescore armed men turned them against the King. I dare not ascribe this boldnesse of the King in chasing of his enemies, to his wisdom, but onely to the stoutnesse of this minde, the which is well known through Gods grace to be brought to good effect by his meanes, though the daunger were neuer so great: soz when he perceiued that the French men had turned themselves to withstand him, he cast away the scaberd of his sword, and comforting his men about him, setting them in good order, exhorted them to play the men lustily. The Archers being placed in the Marsh against the sides of the enemies stood on drie hilles, which were compassed about with quagge myres and foggie places, that neither Horsemen noz fote men might appoche them, but they should rather be drowned in mudde then come nere to hurt them: these also did the King comfort, saying to them (doe well you Archers) play the men lustily, and knowe that I am Edward of Windsor. When the presence of the King, and necessity of the matter, stirred by their hearts to doe well: the Archers encountering their heads, stripping by their sleeves, bent themselves to bestow their arrowes in such sorte that they might not be lost: and as the Frenchmen drew to wards them, they saluted them after with their arrowes. The armed men of both parts stood in order to fight vpon a long and narrowe causeway, the breadth whereof was not able to receiue scarce twentie men of armes in a front, hauing on both sides thereof the Parish, in the which the Archers were placed, who gawled and wounded their enemies on the sides, fleeing as thicke as haile. The King and his men besoze with the Archers on the side, slew and toke a great many: and many of them stood stoutly to it, till at the length by the comming of the Prince of Wales, the French were put to flight: after a long chase in pursuing the enemies, they returning backe againe to Caleis, numbred those which were fled, as well as those which were taken, and they found, that for the taking of the Castle (as the prisoners reported) there came a thousand men of armes, and sixe hundred armed men, but they which serued, were aboute thre thousand: among them which were taken, was Geffery Charney and his sonne, Edward de Renty, Robert Danquile, Otto de Gulo, the Baron of Martingham, Baldyna Saylly, Henry de Prees, Garinus Baylofe, Peter Renel, Peter Dargemole, Eustace de Riplemount and many other, Lords, Knights, and Baronets, who were chased and ranne away with their attents, as the Lord de Mountmarice, also Laundas, who married the Lady Saint Paul Countesse of Pembroke in England, also the Lord Fenas, the Lord Planckes and another Eustace de Replemount. There were slaine in the skirmish the Lord Henry de Boys, the Lord Archibalde, and many others, whose names the Conquerours were not able to certifie. Thus by pollicie and deuised treason the authours thereof came to death and destruction: neither Eustachius himselfe escaped scotfree from the snarcs, for he within a while after being taken by the Frenchmen, was burned alive with a hot yron, and degraded from the order of Knighthood by the cutting off of his heeles, & depriuing of his tongue by abscission: afterward, he was hanged by, and last of all beheaded and quartered, receiuing iust punishment for his treason and false swearing.

This yere the Lord Furniuaill giuing a rashe enterprize vpon his enemies, was taken prisoner in Gascoigne. Not long after King Edward prepared to make a voyage into France, but the Earle of Lancaster, returning out of Gascoigne, signified that there was a truce taken by him, by reason whercof of the passage prepared by the King was laid aside.

This yere on Saint Georges day, the King held a great and solemne feast at his Castle of Windsor, where he had augmented y<sup>e</sup> Chappel which Henry y<sup>e</sup> first and other his progenitoys Kings of England had besoze created of eight Chanons, he added to those eight Chanons, a Deane, and sixtene Chanons more, and 24. poore and impotent Knights, with other ministers and seruants as appeareth in his Charter, Dated the two and twentieth of his raigne.

All these together with the King were clothed in gownes of Rasse, powdered with garters blew, wearing the like garters also on their right legges, and mantels of blew, with scutcheons of S. George. In this sort of apparell they being bare-headed, heard Masse, which was celebrated by Simon Islip Archbishop of Canterbury, & the Bishops of Winchester and Excester, and afterwards they went to the feast, setting themselves orderly at the table, for the honor of the feast, which they named to be of S. George the martyr, and the choosing of the Knights of the Garter.

In the Sommer following, variance rising betwene the states of England and Spaine, the Spaniards beset the Baytaine Sea, with 44. great ships of warre, with the which they sunk ten English ships coming from Gascoigne towards England, after they had taken and spoiled them, and thus their former iniuries being reuenged, they entred into Sluce in Flanders.

King Edward understanding hereof, furnished his nauie of fiftie shippes and Pinaces, forcasting to meete with the Spaniards in their return, hauing in his company the Prince of Wales, the Earles of Lancaster, Northampton, Warwick, Salisbury, Arundale, Huntington, Gloucester, and other Barons and Knights with their seruants and archers, and vpon the feast of the decollation of S. Iohn, about Euen-song time, the Spanies mette at Winchelsea, where the great Spanish vessels surmounting our ships and forres, like as castles to cotages, sharply assailed our men, & stones and quarels flying from the tops, soe and cruelly wounded our men, who no lesse busie to fight alone with launce and sword, and with the foreward manfully defend themselves, at length our Archers pearced their Arbalisters with a further retch then they could strike againe, and thereby compelled them to forsake their place, and caused other fighting from the hatches to shade themselves with tables of the ships, and compelled them that they w<sup>o</sup>stones from the toppes, so to hide them, that they durst not shew their heads, but tumble downe: then our men entring the Spanish vessels with swords and halberds, kill those they met, within a while make boyde the vessels, and furnish them with English men, untill they being beset with darknesse of the night, could not discern the 27. yet remayning untaken: our men cast anker, stubbing of the hoped battell, supposing nothing finished, whilst any thing remained vndone, dressing the wounded, throwing the miserable Spaniards into the Sea, refreshing themselves with victuals and slepe, yet committing the vigilant watch to the armed band. The night overpassed, the English men prepared (but in vaine) to a new battell, but when the sunne began to appeare, they viewing the seas, could perceiue no signe of resistance, for 27. ships flying away by night, left 17. spoiled in the evening, to the Kings pleasure, but against their will.

The King returned into England with victorie and triumph, the King preferred there 80. Noble ymges to the order of knighthood, greatly betwayling the losse of one, to wit, Syr Richard Goldesborough Knight.

Combat before
King Edward.

Two hyed souldiers of the King of Armenia, came into England, into the presence of the King, where they shewed the letters of the aforesaid King of Armenia, wherewith it was signified that the one of them, to wit, Iohn de Viscount, a man bozne in Cipres, had slanderously charged the other, that is Thomas de la March, a French man bozne, and bastard sonne to Phillip late King of France, saying that the said Thomas should haue receiued of the Turkes a certaine somme of gold, for the betraying the armie of the Christians vnto the Emperour of the Turkes: and for the p<sup>ro</sup>ofe of this slander, this Iohn challenged a combate with the said Thomas, to be tried by the iudgement of Edward King of England, and that by him (as by a most worthy Prince,) all strife should be ended. For this therefore were these two worthy souldiers appointed to fight, which they perourmed within the lisses of the Kings palace at Westminster, on Sunday next following after the feast of Saint Michael, where Thomas, in declaration of his innocencie, in that he was accused of, overcame his enemy, but yet killed him not, for he could not, because he was not able to wounde him being so armed, with any kinde of piercing weapon, except it were in his face, which was bare. For after that they had runne at the tilte, and fought on fote, as they were striving together on the ground, with certaine pickes both short and sharpe, then called Gadlings, being closed in the ioyntes of his right gauntlet, the said Thomas stroke the said Iohn in the face, and soze wounded him: but on the other side Iohn had no such short kinde of weapon, wherewith he might hurt Thomas face, and therefore cryed out aloud most horribly, whereupon by the Kings commaundement the Combate was ended, and the victorie adjudged to Thomas, who gaue the said Iohn, being thus overcome, to the Prince of Wales for a Captiue, and offered hye his owne armour to Saint George, in Saint Pauls Church at London, with great deuotion. These matters being thus finished, finished, the Cipres man is manumitted and set at libertie as a free man againe. And Thomas thinking boldly to goe into the presence of his brother the French King, toke his iourney thither, and at his comming, found the said King and the Nobilitie of Fraunce, greatly offended, and in indignation against him, for that he agreed that the combate should be tried before the King of England. Wherefore Thomas thinking secretly with himselfe how to winne the false friendship of his brother, being desirous to thew that therein he had done well, among all other things he greatly praised the nobilitie of Edward and his worthie fame spread ouer al the world, and also the iustice which he vsed in iudging, not accepting the person of the man of Cipres, (yea though hee loued the king himselfe very well) neither suffered him to be preferred before me, which am a Frenchman, and brother, and friend to the my Lord King of Fraunce, iudge ouer the sayd King Edward my aduersarie. Also the Earle of Cle highly praised the King of England, for that he had receiued great comfort and commoditie at his hands during the time of his Captiuitie in England, shewing also how farre that good King had banished enuie and hatred from his heart, who at a time of iusting, being in the field at that exercise, and the King also, was commaunded by the King himselfe to beare away the pryce and prycke from them all. These commendations did the French King enuie at, and for indignation, hee most wickedly commaunded the setters forth of those payples to be beheaded. And for to colour the matter the better, hee sayned that the Earle vsed too much familiaritie with the Quene his wife, and that his brother was guiltie of treason against the king of Fraunce, because he committed his cause and the combat to be thus tryed by the iudgement of the King of England. After hee had thus murdered his brother, hee tormented his wife to death by famine, who was daughter of the noble king of Boheme, lately slaine in battaille by Geoffrey.

William Edington Bishop of Winchester, and treasurer of England, a wise man: but louing the Kings commoditie, more then the wealth of the realme and common people, caused a new coyne called a Groate, and halfe Groate to be coyned, but these were of lesse waight then the pence, called Catterlings, by reason whereof victuals and merchandise became the dearer thow to the whole realme.

After the Octaues of the Purification of our Lady, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, Henry Earle of Lancaster was created Earle of Lincoln, Leicester, Derby, Grosnount and Ferrers, and Duke of Lancaster, vnto whom also was giuen great priuiledges, such as neuer any Earle had before his time. Also Lionel of Antwerpe the kings sonne is made Earle of Ulster in Ireland, Iohn of Gaunt his brother is made Earle of Richmond, and Ralph Baron of Stafford, is made Earle of Stafford. Iohn Mautrauers, one of the murderers of Edward the second, was this yeare restored to his lands.

In the Lent following Walter de Maine, and Robert Herle Captaine of Calais, rode into France, making great prayes and doing great damage, brought away great stoepe of beasts, sheepe, and swine, so that at Calais a fat Colwe was scarcely scarcely sold for sixtē pence sterling. About Easter the Duke of Lancaster departing from Caleis marched alongst the Sea coasts of Artops, and Picardie, bzent the suburbs of Bulloigne, but assaulting the Towne he prevailed not, for that onely the ladders were too short. Therefore he wasted the Cities of Artois, and the haven, also the townes of Fauconbridge and Staples, and in the same hauens he bzent about 120. ships of diuers moulds. After this burning the champion countrey, he rode vnto Saint Omers, and winning by force many fortresses, with a great pray and many prisoners he returned to Caleis. About the feast of Saint George things prospered well in Calcoine, for the Parthall of France, with a great number of armed men spoiled the countrey about Saint Dangel, where Edmond Rose a possfolke man was Captaine, who with the garrison, valiantly encountered the enemies, slew many of them, and took the said Parthall and many other Nobles of France, chassing aboue 400. Knights.

The same yere the Spanisb ships by a treatie of peace came into England, where the last yere they were restrained, but now a truce was taken for twentie yeres, betwixt England and Spaine, and a truce betwixt England and France for one yere, which the Frenchmen bzaie, by reason of taking the Castle of Guisnes, as in the next yere shall be shewed.

About this season the olde coine of gold was changed into a new, the olde Noble was worth much about the tared rate of the new, and therefore the Marchants bought the olde and conueyed them out of the Realme, to the great losse of the king and kingdome, to the which there was a remedie prouided, by changing of the Stampe.

An. reg. 26.

About the beginning of Januarie, the Frenchmen being occupied about the repaying of the wallles of Guisnes towne, being asfoze that time destroyed by the Englishmen, some men of armes of Caleis vnderstanding their doings, deuised how they might ouerthrow the worke, in this sort. There was an Archer named John Dancafer, in prison in the castle of Guisnes, befoze that time taken, who not hauing wherewith to pay his ransome, was let loose, with condition that he should worke there among the Frenchmen. This fellow chanced to lye with a laundress, a strumpet, and learned of her where beyond the principall ditch, from the bottome of the ditch, there was a wall made of two fote broade, stretchig from the rampiers, to the brimme of the ditch within forth, so that being couered with water it could not be sen, but not so downed, but that a man going aloft thereon, should not be wet past the knees, it being made for the vse of fishers: and therefore in the midst it was discontinued for the space of two fote: and so the Archer (his Harlot shewing it to him) measured the height of the Wall with a threde. These things thus knowne, one day slipping downe from the Wall, he passed the ditch by that hidden Wall, and lying hidde in the Marsh till Euening, came in the night nere vnto Caleis, where tarping for the cleare day, he then went into the Towne (for else he might not:) here he instructed them that were greedy of pray and to scale the castle, how they might enter the same: they caused ladders to be made to the length by the Archer appoynted. together, clothing themselves in black armour without any brightnesse, went to the Castle by the guiding of the said Iohn de Dancaſter, and climbing the wall with their ladders, they ſlew the watchmen, and threw them down headlong beſide the Wall: after this, in the Hall they ſlew many whom the found unarmed playing at the Cheſſe and Hazard. Then they brake into the Chambers and Turrets upon the Ladies and Knights that lay there aſleepe, and ſo were made maſters of all that was within: and ſhutting all their priſoners into a ſtrong chamber, being bereft of all their armour, they tooke out the Engliſh men that had been taken the yere befoze and there kept in priſon, and after they had releued them well with meate and drinke, they made them guardiens ouer them that had them in cuſtodie: ſo they wan all the Fortreſſes of the Caſtle, vnknoyn to them that were in the Towne, (appointed to ouerſee the repayying of the broken walles) what had happened to them within the Caſtle. In the morning they commanded the workmen in the towne to ceaſe from their workes, who thereupon perceiuing that the Caſtle was wonne, ſtraight waies fled, and the new Caſtilians, ſuffered the Ladies to depart on horſebacke, with their apparell, writings, and ornaments, where they ought to hold their ſees: and the ſame day there came from Caleis to their ayde ſuch perſons as they ſent for, by whoſe ayde they kept the Caſtle: and about thre of the clocke there came two Knights, ſent from the Earle of Guiſnes, who demanding a truce, willed to know of them that were thus entred the Caſtle, who they were, to whom they belonged, and by whoſe authority they kept the Caſtle ſo taken in the time of truce, whereunto they answered: that being intruded, they would not declare to any man their purpoſe, till they had tryed a longer poſſeſſion: and therefore on S. Matowice day, the Abbot (the King being buſie in Parliament,) to the Frenchmen being ſent from the ſayd Earle of Guiſnes, declared, how in preludice of the truce, the ſayd Caſtle was taken, and therefore by right of mutuall faith it ought to bee reſtozed vnto them. The king answered, that without his knowledge that enterpriſe was made, and therefore he gaue commandement to his ſubiects, that none of them ſhould deteine the caſtle of Guiſnes, but deliuer it vnto the lawfull Lords thereof. The meſſengers being returned home, and reporting what they had done, the Earle of Guiſnes cometh to the Caſtle, demanding of them within, as at other times, in whoſe name they kept it. Who conſtantly affirming that they kept it in the name of Iohn Dancaſter, hee required to know if the ſame Iohn were the King of Englands liegeman, or would obey him: who answering that hee knew not what meſſengers had been in England: the Earle offered for the Caſtle, beſides all the treasure found in it, many thouſands of Crownes, or poſſeſſions for exchange, and a perpetuall peace with the King of Fraunce. To this they answered, that befoze the taking of that Caſtle they were Engliſhmen by nation, but by their demerites bought for the peace of the King of England, wherefoze the place which they thus held, they would willingly ſell or exchange, but to none ſoner then to their naturall King of England, to whom they ſayd, they would ſell their Caſtle, to obtaine their peace: but if hee would not buy it, then they would sell it to the King of France, or to whom soever would give most for it.

The Earle being thus shifted off from them, the king of England bought it in dede, and so had that place which he greatly desired. The Fortresse was wont to stop by the passage into the higher Countrey, giuing to some great suerty from the Forragers, that were to issue forth of Caleis. The Counsell of Fraunce therfore wishing to haue that Castle againe, or to builde another of like vtilitie, for the defence of the Countrey thereabouts, they sent for Geoffrey Charney lately redeemed out of English Captiuitie, with authoritie to build and fortifie as followeth.

fied.

To them that trauaile from Guisnes to Caleis there was a place on the left hand strong, but decayed, hauing a Church, in which certaine priests were resident, and it was called Lalbastie: this place was so nere to Guisnes, that the Englishmen standing without the gate of their Fortresse might shote to it. This Monastierie of priests might easily be made defensible, for it had high walles like a Castle, and a high towre, and very large for a steeple, and being situate in a marshy ground, it might with small labour be compassed with a ditch. This place the Englishmen had spared for deuotion sake, but till that the foresaid Geoffrey, in breach of truce, with a mightie powre besieged Guisnes, and remoued the priests from the Church, making a Castle of the Church, and fencing the walles with rampire and ditch: and this was about Pentecost, in which season the waters not impeaching him, his people might worke in the parish. They within the Castle therfore being besieged, were vnneth able to come abroade with their boates by the ditches that were full of water, and by the parish unpasseable and also full of water, neither they of Caleis could victuall them by any manner of meane, by reason of the siege, and warding that was kept at Lalbastie. They that were thus besieged, oft times sallied out and fought with them of Lalbastie, but sue very few, sometime with arrowes, and sometime with other weapons: at length, vpon a day appointed, the Calisians, with them of Dye and Parkes on the one part, and they within Guisnes on the other, met, set on their enemies, slew many, chased many, and finally burnt by Lalbastie, and dismantling the walles, made all plaine with the ground.

Lalbastie burnt
and rased.

This yeare, the Duke of Lancaster going into Spuce, by the aduice and ordinance of the king, his daughter was espoused in England to William Duke of Zeland, eldest sonne to Lewis Duke of Baiuir, that intruded vpon the Romane Empire.

Walter Bentley
sep. and Robert Knolles make a hopage into France.

About the fiftenth of August, Walter Bentley Captaine, Robert Knolles, and other, in the marches of Bytaine, valiantly encountered their enemies, where in a fight doubtfull for a good while, were slaine the principall Marshall of France, also the Lords of Quintin, of Curtinoke, of Richmont, of Mount Albon, of Leguel, of Launey, of Montbech, of Vile Chastel de la March, & other knights, in number 140. and Bachelers, to the number of 500. whose coatfearmors were brought away: the number of commons were not counted. There were taken the Lord of Bussebeke, sonne of the Marshall Bertram, also Tristram de Malcis, the Lord of Paletret, the Vicount of Comaine, maine, Geoffrey de Graues, William de la Vall, Charles Darchefill, John de Bruse, and other knights, with Bachelers, about 130. This armie of the French men, vnder the conduct of the said Marshall, of purpose deuised by him, was so beset on the backe halfe, with the strepente of a Montaine, that ste they could not, to the end that hope of flight being taken frō them their courage to fight might the more encrease. There were many of those knights surnamed of the starre, who in their profession had conspired neuer to turne their fearefull backs vpon their enemies, of which number of knights, there were among them slaine and taken, numbed 45. From that dangerous encounter few escaped unhurt, and among other, the foresaid Walter Bentley Captaine was so wounded, who commanded thirtie archers to be condemned, so that in the greatest heate of the fight they fled.

Starre.

The Earle of Stafford also entred into Gascoigne, where encountering with a great armie of the French men that were issued forth of the fortreffe of Gagent, he discomfited, toke, and chased them: there was taken that valiant knight Bruse Gaude, and seuen knights of the starre. Shortly after, died John Dediaselles, and Thomas Wale, knights of great valour.

The same yere, it being heard that Pirats troubled the Seas, there were seuen ships of warre ordeyned, certaine Pinaces attending vpon them: ouer the which were admirals, Thomas Cooke, and Richard Tottlesham knights, who scoured the seas about the coast of Picardy and Normandy, but before the feast of S. George, they returned as they wished.

Whilist these things were a doing by Sea and Land, Otto sonne to the Duke of Brunswike, the French kings seed man, sent letters to the Duke of Lancaster, being returned out of Spyrce, by y<sup>e</sup> tenour wherof he accused him, affirming that as he returned out of Spyrce by Colein, he maliciously informed the Coloners, that the said Otto went about by stealth to haue taken him prisoner, and to haue presented him to the French king, adding hereunto, that because he neuer went any such taking of him, he was ready in declaration of his good name, by a singular combat onely in the French kings Court, to proue the Duke of Lancaster a lyer touching the said article. The letters were not sealed, and therefore, least it might haue ben thought folly to haue giuen credite to the letter, deliuered by a seruant, the Duke sent vnto Otto two knights to learne the cause of the chalenge, and to demand thereof his letters patents, sealed with his seale of armes, which knights accomplishing the effect of their iourney, and returning with speede, the Duke sent to the French king for a safe conduct for himselfe and his men, and with much adoe obtaining it, he went to Paris, where in the lists, in presence of the French king, the king of Navarre, and the Duke of Burgoyne, and many Peeres, and other of the Realme of Fraunce, he mounted on his steed in seemely wise, ready in all signes, without default, to trie the combat, and so staid till his adversary was ready, and the voyce of the Herault and Cantor to be had by their common oath, for the assurance of his word, and to obey the Law. On the contrary part, the said Otto scarcely was set on his horse, and was not able decently to set on his helmet, nor to walde his speare (or else he sayned)

whose unblaneness being perceived by the French king, the king of Navarre, and other, the king took the quarrell into his hands, whereupon Otto was commaunded first to depart the lists, and so went his way, but the Duke abode still within them. After this, by commaundement of the French king, Otto swore that he should neuer after that day appeach the Duke of Lancaster of that article: and so from thence the Duke returned home by Zeland.

After the Epiphanie, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, wherein an ordinance was made at the instance of the Londoners, that no knowne whoze should weare from thenceforth any hode, except reved or striped of diuers colours, nor furre, but garments reuerfed or turned the wrong side outward, vpon paine to forfeit the same.

This yere, the dearth of Cozne by them of Ireland, and the Irish men that brought in cozne to sell vnto diuers Hauens of the Realme, was asswaged, to the great reliefe of the people.

King Edward altered the Chappell, which his progenitors before had founded of Saint Stephen at Westminster, into a colledge of twelue secular Chansons, twelue Alcars, and other ministers accordingly, and endued it with revenues, to the summe of five hundred pound by yere.

The morrow after Saint Mathies day began a Parliament, wherein it was ordeined that the Staple of wooll before kept in flawnders at Bridges, should from thenceforth be holden in diuers parts of England, Wales and Ireland, as at Newcastle, Poike, Lincoln, Canterburie, Norwich, Westminster, Chichester, Winchester, Excester, Bristow, and Carmarden.

The Earle of Northampton went into Scotland with a great companie of armed men, and archers, where he rode through the marches, and enforced the castle of Loghman, and other fortresses to yeld, and took the Scots that were laid in ambushes. He also held a treatie of peace with the Scots, who gladly would haue redēmed their king, and made a perpetuall peace with the Englishmen, but yet so as the king of Scots should not hold his land of the king of England.

Innocent the first, for the desire of peace, sent the Cardinall of Bononie to Caleis, to heare the treatie of the finall peace betwixt the kingdomes of England and Fraunce, to whom repaired the Counsellors of both Realmes, with full authoritie to treat and constitute the conditions of the same peace, and at length they agreed vpon this point, that the king of England should resigne all his right that he had to the Realme of Fraunce, and remit it to the French king, and should haue therfore the Dutchie of Aquitaine, and the Counties of Artoys and of Guisnes, for him and his successors king of England, without that he should hold the same of the French kings in any manner of wise.

To these conditions the King of England gaue his consent, and for the assurance of the covenants, Embassadors are sent to the Sea of Rome from epyther Realme. On the King of Englands behalfe went the Bishoppe of Norwich, the Duke of Lancaster, the Earle of Arundell, and other knights, who going to Aulnion, there came to them the Archbishoppe of Rohan, the Duke of Burgoine, Geoffrey Chamey, and other of the French Kings

Counsell:

Counsell: all these were receiued in great honour: many Cardinals and Bishops met the duke of Lancaster, who brought him for the space of two miles vnto Auinion, and to the Popes pallace: at length in the Consistorie of the Pope, he with the Cardinalls and Embassadors being present, the causes of their message was declared, and the Embassadors of England requested that the covenants confirmed, which had been concluded at Cales: to whom the Frenchmen answered, that gladly they would haue peace, but touching Aquitaine, and the foresaid Counties, as they said, the French King could not, nor they might giue their assents that the same should be alienated from the entire body of the kingdome, the which, as well the King as they had taken an oth to maintaine, but yet they could be contented that the profitable domination of the said Dutchy and Counties should be deliuered, and come to the King of England, as his Auncesters had Aquitaine, but so yet as the regalitie of the Crowne of France should euer be reserued. The Englishmen requested that these said dominions should be absolutely, and without any condition restored to the King: answer also was made to the reason of the Frenchmen, touching the oth of their King and themselves, whereby they were bound to conserue the integritie of the honour of their kingdome, to wit, that the Pope for the benefite of peace might assoile them from the said oth, and this as to certaine articles premitted, it should be very well done: but yet nothing was done that might be of force to the furthering of the peace. And so the Embassadors without effect returned home, the Bishop of Poerwich excepted, that deceased, and was buried there, to whom succeeded Thomas Percy.

The King of Nauarre through a brawle raised, slew Charles de Spaine, Marshall of France, whereupon to auoide the displeasure and punishment of the French King, he fled into his owne Countrey, sending his vncle vnto the Duke of Lancaster with letters humbly beseeching him that he would come into Poermandie to his aide and defence, and to receiue an oth of fidelitie and amittie of him against al men. The Duke therefore getting licence of the King, assembled together a great nauie at Southampton, where when the Duke was ready to haue made saile, Knights that he had sent into Poermandie, came backe to shew the truth of this business, by whom it was notified to the Duke, that the said King of Nauarre his cousin was reconciled to the King, and so the Dukes voyage was stayed.

The friers Augustines Church in London was redified by Humfrey Bohune Earle of Hereford and Essex, whose body was buried in the quire of the same Church.

A great dissention fell in Orford, betwene a Scholler and a Wintner, for a quarte of wine, so that the Scholler powzed the wine on the Wintners head, and brake his head with the pot, by reason whereof, a great conflict was made betwixt the Schollers of the Uniuersitie, and the lay men of the towne, in the which, many lay men were wounded, and about twenty slaine. These troubles continued the space of two dayes, and then the religious men of the towne labouring to make peace, the lay men pursued a Scholler, & wounded him to death, yet that day the tumult was appeased, but on the morrow, the people of the villages about Oxfoꝛd, being confederate with the lay men of the towne came with great force, and erected a blacke banner, whereupon the Schollers fledde to their Colledges, but the Lay men breaking vp the doores, slew many of them, and thye we them into their pyuies: they cut and rent their bookes, and bare away what they liked. By this meanes the vniuersitie was dissolued, the Schollers (sauing of Oꝛtton Colledge) went vnto their friends, and so continued moze then a yere. Many, both Schollers and Lay men were indited by the kings Iustices, amongst the which, foure Burgeses that had been Pastors of Oxfoꝛd, were sent vnto the Tower of London.

About the twentieth of Nouember, King Edward held a Parliament at Westminster, in the which was granted towards the recouerie of his title in France, fiftie shillings of euery sacke of Woll to be transpoted ouer the seas for the space of five yeres then next following, by meanes whereof, the King might daily dispend during the said five yeres, moze then one thousand marks sterling, for by the common opinion, there were moze then an hundred thousand sackes of Woll yerele into fozaine lands transpoted, so that during those five yeres, the said grant extended to 150000. pounds sterling.

Oxfoꝛd restoꝛed.

King Edward held a great Jussing at Woodstocke, for honour of the Quene, who was then purifed of her sonne Thomas.

After Easter, in a Parliament at Westminster, the king toke the quarrell of Oxfoꝛd into his hands, and sauing euery mans right, he forgaue the schollers all the whole trespasse, so that in the summer following, the Vniuersitie began againe to flourish, and the king gaue to the Chancellour of Oxfoꝛd the onely view of the assise of bread, ale, and wine, and all other victuals, excludung the Maior utterly from that office. The communaltie of the Towne gaue to the Vniuersitie two hundred and fiftie pounds for amends, sauing vnto them neuerthelesse the actions which they had vnto euery singuler person of the Towne.

Ex Record.

In this Parliament, the procelle of the indgement made against Roger Mortimer Earle of March, was reuoked, deemed erroneous & false, so that the young Roger Mortimer, sonne to Edmond Mortimer, sonne and heire to Roger Mortimer, was restozed to the title and possessions of the Earledome of March, as cousin and heire to his grandfather.

King Edward
sailed into Fraunce.

King Edward being about Sandwich, on his iourney towards Fraunce, and the Prince of Wales at Sutton in Deuonshire, on his voyage towards Aquitaine, looking for a prosperous wind, by the space of foztie dayes or moze, all things else being readie, the French King had his armies diuided in sundie places about in the hauens of Normandie, and other parts, to impeach the landing of the King and Prince, and so long they lay there, that the Frenchmen with their hired loubiours did sowly waste their owne Countrey, and consumed so many thousands of Crownes out of the French Kings coffers vainele, that in the ende he being needie, payde not his people, and so hee was forsaken of them, that when King Edward wasted Fraunce, the French King had not men to encounter him, but fledde before him, as hee followed, burning his owne Townes, and destroying victuals, tuales, that the king should find neither harboꝝough nor meate.

After the moneth of August, the king of England, and the Duke of Lancaster, with seven thousand armed men, and their retinue, entred France, and by the space of nine daies journey, as they went, waſting all by fire that came in their way, and returning to Calcis, the king heard that the Scots entred by ſtealth, and had taken the Town of Warwike, the Baron of Grayſtroke being in the army with the king, to whom the charge of that Towne had been committed, whereupon the king haſted vnto Warwike, and with in ſiſtēne daies recouered the Towne againe, being deliuered vnto him, life and liberty to depart being giuen vnto them that were found therein.

After this he paſſed through Scotland vnto the Scottiſh ſea, but becauſe victuals ſayled for his army, the king giuing them licence, they all returned towards England. There followed on the taile of the army, by the ſpace of twelue miles, Robert Herle, Almerike de Saint Edmond, Robert de Hildeſley, and other, whom the Scots in the night ſeaſon found aſleepe and at reſt, doubting nothing of any miſadventure, wherefoze they gaue a cruell aſſault vpon them, with an hideous noyſe and crye, where, after long reſiſtance, Robert de Hildeſley, and Iohn Branceſter knights were taken priſoners, Robert Herle and Almericke hauing much adoe to eſcape, for the ſaid knights perceiuing the Scots to be too ſtrong for them, thought with themſelues, that their Lords being Barons, of whom they held in fee, would redēme them, and ſo wply withdrawing, deliuered them from the Scots captiuitie.

Henry Duke of Lancaſter being appointed chiefe Admirall of the Engliſh ſhawe, landed it at Hogges about the feaſt of Saint Bartholomew, and from thence rode towards Normandie, being accompanied with Philip, brother to the king of Nauarre, who deſired aide of the ſaid Duke, and requeſted him to come to helpe him. At this ſeaſon, the French king hauing the king of Nauarre, Geffrey Harecourt, and diuers other noble men in great ſuſpition, touching the Realine and Kingdome, bidde them all to a feaſt, where he toke the ſaid king of Nauarre, and caſt him in priſon, and murdered the reſt of the noble men, ſauing, Geffrey Harecourt, whom he cauſed to be beheaded with an axe.

The king of Nauarre being thus impriſoned, his brother Philip ſeaſed many Caſtels and holds into his hands which were in Normandy and thereabout, ſtrongly fortifying them with men and victuals, through the help of the Duke of Lancaſter, being manned as well with Engliſhmen, as with the men of the ſame Countrey, to withſtand the Frenchmen.

The ſame time when the king paſſed ouer to Calcis and France, his eldeſt ſonne Prince of Wales, hauing with him the Earles of Warwike, Suffolke, Salisburie, and Arſord, toke ſhipping in the beginning of October at Sutton Hauen in Deuonſhire, and luckily ſayled, and landed at Burdeaur, where he was honourably receiued by the Biſhop and Clergy being accompanied with all the common people in the firſt ſonday of that moneth: The ſonday following, the Prince going out, lodged two miles from Burdeaur, in the Caſtell of Arnoun. On the next day, he paſſed through a freight wood, and so through the middle of the towne of Lougan, sometimes walled, but now defaced: and so passing on a long journey, he lost many horses, and came at length to the strong Castell of Wandreit. On Thursday he came to the Citie of Belas, hauing in it a Cathedral Church, and a couent of friers monks. On Friday proclamation was made in the army, that euery man should beare the armes of Saint George, and it was said that his enemies bare the same also. On Satterday he passed to the Castell of Pau, where stand thre castles of thre Lords, wherof one he weth a farre off.

On Friday the twelfth of that moneth, his army passed the lands of Morbiur, which are belonging to the Earle of Flur, this daies journey being long and tedious, hee lost many of his horses in the wast ground called the Launds. Two miles from the towne of Aurule, hee displayed his banners, and diuided his armie into diuers troupes. In the balward, whereto was thre thousand men of armes, were the earle of warlike high Constable, Reignold Cobham, Lord Marshall, Lord Beauchampe, a Somersetshire man, the Lord Clifford, and the Lord Thomas of Hampton, belonging to the Ancients, and with them seuen Barons of Gascoigne. In the middleward, whereto were seuen thousand men of armes, besides Clerkes and Pages, there was the Prince himselfe with a double Antient, the Earle of Oxford, the Lord Bartholomew Burwash, the Lord Iohn de Lile, the Lord Willowby, the Lord le Ware, the Lord Maurice Barkley, sonne to Thomas Lord Barkley then liuing, very olde, the Lord Iohn Bourlers, Lord Iohn Rose the elder of Burdeaur, Capitaine de la Busch, the Lord Camount, the Lord Mountferrant, with their antients. In the rereward was foure thousand men of armes, committed to the charge of the Earle of Suffolke, the Earle of Salisburie, and the Lord Pemers, who led the Vernences: In the whole army was of men of armes, Clerks, Pages, Archers, Bigants, and other, about 60000. men, and this day was Ienken Barefort, and diuers other made knights, and the village of Aurule, with thre other villages (wherof William Lord Raymond was Capitaine) were deliuered by vnto the Prince, whereto he lodged his army, and resting there two daies, as many as would were suffered to go out, and take victuals, and byent their enemies countrey. On Tuesday, they lodged in the towne of Mount Clere, where the Castell belonging thereunto was giuen by to the Prince, and after he left it againe to the Frenchmen, by reason of fire which brake by in the town, whereupon the Prince went out into the field, and lodged in his tentes, euer after refusing to lie in any towne. This day hauing taken thre towne, and burning them, hee made knights Gilotus de Straton, and diuers other. Also Iohn de Lile stricken with a quarrell at Ausage, died. On Wednesday and Thursday he lay still, and on Friday he came befoze the strong towne of Neegeron, where he lodged in his tentes. On Saterdag he came befoze Placence, a very faire town, & a strong, the inhabitants wherof fled away into the Castell, where the Earle of Polesni, and many knights were taken by Capitaine de la Bouch, and the Lord Mountferrant, & de Lonchis, who was that day made knight. On Sunday S. Lukes day, they staid at Elwant, and taking the fort of Gallan, by force, they set it on fire, and burnt it. On Sunday day casting fire in the towne of Blacence, they passed along, leauing the towne of Beal Marchi on the right hand, and lodged befoze the towne of the Archbishop of Anser, called Le Wafe. On this day Richard Stafford brother vnto the Earle of Stafford, led his men with his Antient towarde the towne: and on the next day being Tuesday, the towne was yelded vnto him, and because it belonged to the Church, the Prince would not suffer any man to enter into it, excepting certaine persons appointed of purpose, for the deliuering of victualles. On Wednesday they leauing the faire towne of Escamout, on the left hand, they came befoze the noble towne of Gerand, belonging to the Earle of Comenge, which was full of armed souldiours, and the Prince lodged in the great monasterie of Bartons, in the which Abbey, there was not so much as one liuing creature found. On Thursday they lay still, doing no harme to the said Abbey. On Friday they went out of the faire and rich countrey of Arminake, and entered the countrey of Ausserike, through the which, the passage was very hard and hilly, and lodged at Saraunt a towne, they set it on fire, contrary to the commaundement of the prince.

All that day, and thre daies following, they passed alongst by the high hills of Aragon. On Saturday, they came to the towne of Saint Poze, where the rereward of the army lodged in a great monasterie of blacke monkes, which were all fled away: the middle ward at Vilfrankes, and the backward at Tremaine: these villages being very rich, and full of victualles, had no man in them, for all the inhabitants were fled.

Sunday the foure and twentieth of October, they passed a certaine sword, and entered into the lands of the Earle of Comenge, which reached vnto Tolouse, but these countreies were wasted with fire and sword, and leaning on the left hand the towne called Sannetere in Ausrike, the passed by the strong Citie of Alibers, where Pope Iohn the two and twentieth remouing the blacke monkes, erected a Bishops see, and they were lodged in a great & rich towne called Sotanco, belonging to the Earledome of Comenge, where was a couent of fraters minors: and burning this towne on Monday they passed through a goodly wide countrey, very plaine, and so came to the tows of Saint Joy, and Saint Liz. On Tuesday they rested: and on Wednesday being the feast of Simon and Iude, the army passed through the riuer of Geround, being a water very fierce, stony and terrible: and againe the same day, through the riuer of Arage, much more dangerous, and came vnto Tolouse: befoze that time, neuer durst any horseman passe ouer these waters, wherfore the people of this countrey being wonderfully made afraid, could not tell what to doe, for being sodainly taken, they could not flee: that night, the prince lodged at Algard, a little towne, one mile from Tolouse. On Tuesday they came vnto the faire and great town called Mount Giffard, being part of the inheritance of the Lord Almerike de la Fossad, the which town the French king had taken from him, because he was the king of Englandes sedeman. Fast by the said towne were twelue Windmilles, the which they set on fire all at once. There were taken two espies, they certified the Prince that the Earle of Arminake was at Tolouse, and the Conneftable of France at Mount Paban, foure leagues from Tolouse. On Friday, they passed on towards Auinion, by the good towne of Basige, and the Towne called Franke, and the whole armie lodged at the great Towne called Autonet, and the middle ward and rereward lay in one side of the Suburbs, and the halward lay on the other side of the Towne, which the townesmen perceiving, fled everie one.

There were about this town twentie Windmills, which they set on fire. On Satterday the last of October, they lodged in the great Towne called Clastalnanner, where a Church of the Chanons, a couent of Friers Monozs, and another of Carmelites, with an Hospitall, and a village called Les mauns de Pucels, with a couent of Friers Augustines, were all consumed with fire. On Sunday, the feast of All saints, the army rested, out of the which armie, certaine going to take botties, they toke a little Towne, the inhabitants wherof to be spared from spoyling, gaue them ten thousand florens of gold. On Monday they marched along by y<sup>e</sup> townes of S. Mathele Port, and the great Town called Wilkapinch, and from thence, they entered the Countrey of Carkason, & the Prince lodged at a little village called Alse. On Tuesday they came to Carkason, a faire Towne, rich & well built, bigger then London. Within the wals, betwixt the towne of Sanburge, and the City being double walled, there ran a goodly water, which passed vnder a faire stone bridge, at the foote wherof, were foure couents of religious, of the which, the Friers ran not away, but the other fled into the Citie. The whole armie was lodged in the Towne, which abounded with Muscadell, and all other delicate victualles. This day, the sonnes of the Lord Libret, and Maister Bassier, with Rowland Daues, and many other, were made knights.

France burnt.

On Wednesday and Thursday, the armie lying still in the Towne, and hauing made a truce, they parlied with them of the Citie concerning a peace, the Citizens offering for sauing the Towne from burning two hundred and fiftie thousand of golden Soules: the Prince answered, he came not for gold, but to take Cities and Townes, together with their inhabitants, and the next day commaunded the Towne to be burnt.

On Friday, the Towne being burnt, the armie departed, leaning on the left hand the Castell of Botenake untouched, passing through the champaigne Countrey, burning Townes called la Rustican, and all the countrey therabout.

On Satterday they trauelled through a great wind and dust, leaving on the left hand a great poole of fresh water, being in compasse about xxx. leagues, and is called Casibon. They came to a Towne called Silony, which was yielded to the Prince, and therefore neuer touched: and the Prince was lodged that night at a good towne called Canet. On Sunday the eight day of Nouember, they passed the water of Sandey, partly at the ford called Chastell de Terre, and partly ouer a bridge, and so trauelled betwixt high hills, vnto the great Citie of Parbon, whereof that Countrey taking his name is called Gallia Narbonensis. The Citie was verie strong, and well walled, hauing in it a great Cathedraall Church: also a notable Castle, belonging to the Bishop, a verie strong Tower for the Earle of the same Towne. It had also a Suburbe called a Borough, much bigger, and better built, then the Borough of Carcalon.

Bishop

In the Borough were foure Couents of religious persons. Betwixt the Borough and the Citie, there runneth a water called Ande, comming from Carcalon, and runneth into the Greekish sea. Betwixt the Citie and the Borough are two bridges of stone, and the third of timber, built with store-houses for diuers Merchandises. The prince was lodged in the house of Carmelite friars. On Tuesday the Borough being set on fire, the armie passing to the waters side, went ouer it in diuers places. From thence, they went and lodged at the Towne and Castell of Ambion. On Wednesday they travelled an euill iourney, and hurtfull to the horse for lacke of water. On Thursday Theodorike Dale, Porter of the Princes chamber, was made Knight: thence the armie passed by a good Town called Almes: the middleward passed vnto the good Towne of the Earle of Aile, called Arnile, where they lodged that night. The Prince lay at the Friers Priours, where was great abundance of Muskabell, being prouided for the Countesse of the Aile, which was all spoiled. This day also, the good Towne of Pipions was destroyed, with the Castle therof called Redote. On Friday, the army passing by a long stonie way, lodged at Lamlan. On Saturday, returning backe toward Gascoigne, they left on their right hand the great pole of Esboue, and Carcalon, and all the iourney that they went befoze, and the reuerward lodged at a good Towne called Abier, and the middleward at Puchfancies, where a Castle being defended, withstood them a season, but at the length was woon, and the Prince lay beyond the Bridge, by a fayze running water, on both sides wherof, the Countrey was spoiled with fire, together with the good Towne of Besaunce where the backward was lodged that night. On Sunday they travelled a long iourney, because the Prince should be lodged in the great Abbey of our Lady de Prolion, where in seuerall Cloysters did liue 100. Predicants, wherunto, the Prince was deuoutly receiued. In the day, the armie set on fire the Towne of Lemins, where there was farre greater Couents of Religious, then at Carcalon. Also, they burnt the faire Towne called Falanges, vnto which Towne belonged one and twentie Windmilles. They burnt also the Townes of Anlard, and Serre, with all the whole Countrey lying thereabouts. On Monday the middleward lodged at the good Towne called Dealpughon, which long time was defended, but at length gotten by force, the Castell wherof yielded, vnto the which Towne and Castell, the Prince commaunded, that no harme should be done by fire. On Tuesday early passing ouer the river of Beseille, they entered into a countrey which was broad. About one a clocke, they came befoze a great Abbey called Bourghbon, where the Earle of Flurens with great joy receiued the Prince, hee being newly escaped out of prison from Paris, where he had laine by the space of two yéars: and the said earle remained from that time faithfull to the Prince. This day they rode in the Lordships and seignories of the same Earle, by the towne of Pafel and Colmon, and on the right hand they passed by the great towne of Saint Canole, and the high Castell called Hautripe: but on this day they brent nothing for reuerence of the foresaid Carle & his vineyards, but passed againe ouer the water of Arage, leauing also Tolouse as they did at the first, but then one mile on the left hand, and now foure leagues on the right, and the middle ward was lodged in the great towne of Permount, which together with the Castell was brent. On Wednesday, they passed by the Castell of the Carle of Flure called Mounthane, at the foote wherof, all the horsemen passed ouer the great water Geround, & there toke the towne and castell of North, then leauing the riuer of Gerond on the left hand, and so passed vnto the towne of Parconaw, which they toke: then they returned ouer the riuer againe, & toke the strong town of Carbone. On Thursday the army rested. On Friday word was brought to the Prince that the french were by, and had gathered a great force, which they had deuised into fine great battels, being in the field not farre from them, wherupon our me set themselves in battel aray, about one mile from the place where they lodged, and being now ready to fight, some one of the souldiers by chance start a hare, whereupon a great shout was made, which the enemies hearing, they sent out fourty light horsemen, to see what was the cause thereof, who drawing nigh to the English army, and perceiuing them to be set in battell aray, returned backe againe, and declared what they had seene: whereupon presently the whole army of frenchmen fled with great feare. The same day Bartholomew Burwash, John Chandos, and James de Audley, with 24. light horsemen, were appointed scouters, and comming to the taile of the frenchmen, they toke prisoners 32. Knights and Gentlemen, amongst whom they toke the Carle of Comeme, also they slue many Carters, and Wagoners. The Prince lodged in the town of Puwose. On Saturday they marched to the Castle of Dradry, in which Castle the Prince lodged, and in the morning they burnt it. On Sunday the two and twentieth of Nouember, about euening, they perceiued that their enemies were on the other side of the great Hill hard by the great town of Gemount, so that the Englishmen being benighted, sent out 1r. light horsemen, and certaine bowmen vnto the right hand of the towne called Auremount, where finding 400. men of armes of the Constable of Fraunce, they chased them out of the town, and slew and toke many: the middle Ward lodged at Auremount, and the Ward at Colimont. Early in the morning the Wagoners being commanded to remaine in the towne of Auremount, all the residue being diuided into troupes, went into the field, waiting for the comming of their enemies, all in vaine: for the prince taking the towne of Gaimount, was told that his enemies fled away at midnight. On Tuesday the army lodged in the field, and for lacke of water, their horse were faine to drinke wine, wherupon it came to passe, that the next day their horses were so drunke they could not go right forth, and many of them died. On Saint Katherines day, with much adoe they came to water, and leauing the towne of Florence on their right hand, they passed to the great towne called Sillard, and the middle ward was lodged at a towne called Realmount, which they toke by maine force, & therefore brent it. On Thursday they rested. On Friday they traualled a long iourney, by walled towne and strong castles, the middle ward lodged at Serde. On Satterday they passed ouer a certaine Water with great difficultie, and through womes, till they came to a good towne called Melin. On Sunday the pzince rested, and toke homage and oathes of the townsmen. On Monday S. Andrewes day trauellling a long iourney, they came to the town of Tolouise, where were thre Castles. On Tuesday the pzince trauelled to the castle of Melan, where belodged. On Wednesday the pzince came to Regla, where his hozses and Wagons passed through the riuier of Gerond. In this towne of Regla, the pzince appointed diuers Barons and such like to winter in diuers places of the Marches, to the intent they should keepe the inland parts of Gascoigne against the Frenchmen.

Thursday

An. reg. 30.

The pzince of Wales touching these matters aforesaid, and for other considerations also, caused a new coyne of gold to be made in Gascoigne, being busied himselfe about the repairing of such things as were decayed & throlwen downe. And in this season, there sprang by a foolish fantasie in the French mens heads, that the k. of England was come into Normandy, the cause of which rumour rose by, for that the Duke of Lancaster, after that he had fortified the strong places belonging to the k. of Fawarre, which were in the Ile of Constance & other places, did direct his iourney towards Brytaine, wherof he was newly made chiefe captaine. Another cause was this, Philip brother to the king of Fawarre, came into England, and earnestly craved aid of the king against the French king, who kept his brother in prison, that hee might by force of armes restore all such lands vnto him as were wrongfully withhelden from him, whereupon hee offering to do homage and fealtie, had (of the kings appointment) Miles Stapleton a man of great integritie, and in martiall affaires verie skilfull, him (I say) the king appointed to be his faithfull fellow. These men with two thousand men wel appointed traueling through Normandy, toke towne & fortresses, burning diuers of them, passing along till they came to a castle nine leagues distant from the Citie of Paris: neither did they assake their trauell, untill they had forced their enemies to enter into a pcerely truce. By this meanes a great report and no lesse seare filled the hearts of the Frenchmen, which reporte at length came to the eares of the Pzince lying at Regla, wherefore he gathering all the power hee had with him in his Dukedome, to the intent to mete his Father, which hee must doe by traueilling through Fraunce, hee came at length to Bragetat, where hee was certified that the Earle of Armentia, would after his departure haue spoyled the Countrey, and for that intent had prouided a great band of men: wherefore hee sent backe to the Gouvernour of Gascoigne vnto Bernard de Liber, and other. From thence the pzince went into France through the coastes of Berry and Limon, still encouraging his men against their enemies, sending before him John Chandos, James Dawdeley, and other complices, to trie out the state of their enemies Countrey, least perhaps some crafty ambushmet might sodainly assault our men, afore they were aware. He himselfe remouing his campe euery day, and now being entred into Picautia, his espies brought word that the French king had gathered a great armie, being now in Aurelian, who also knew of the princes comming, so he sent out espies to discover our armie, amongst whom Griffin Micco of Chamblay, petie captaine of two hundred men, meeting with other espies, came to his coast: so our espies took the thirty of them, and due the residue, so that there was not one of them left to carry word what was become of their fellows. Our espies proceeded towards Romerentine, where meeting with the Lord Crone, and Lord Bilgand, they set upon them and due them, their chiefe Captains being forced to flee to a Castle, and having taken their lodging in a Towne, the prince commanded that on the morning a great assault should be given to them of the Castle.

The day following our men being all armed, passed through the ditches, and came unto the wals of the Castle, some applied to scale the wal with ladders, some burne the gates, and entring, due a great many of the chiefe men, but the Lords before named fled unto the principall tower of the castle: but the prince determined not to depart, till they that were besieged, were either taken or yielded: at length the Castle being undermined, the men besieged, with all humilitie yielded up the Castle. After this the spies declared that the French king was come down to Turon, to provide armies to go against the Prince, of the which tidings the Prince being glad, he pight his tentes against the French king, but could not passe the river of Leger, by reason of great floods, and the French king had broken all the Bridges, to the intent there should be no passage betwixt the Prince & the Duke of Lancaster, whose armies might wel every night perceiue each others fires in the Campes: but the Prince following alongst the river of Legers Eastward, he pight his tentes nere unto Turon, where looking for the French king foure daies, hoping to fight with him, for that he was distant but one league off, he understood that the French king was rettyed backe to Blamie, ten leagues off: passing ouer by a Bridge the River of Legers at a place used betwixt two strong Townes, and so toward Poitiers. This rettying of the French king certified, the prince returned backe, intending to haue met him in the way, which he could not doe: yet crossing ouer all, as he imagined the nêrer way, he set upon the taile of his enemies, and cut from them the Carles of Anyni and Winters, and also the marshal of Burgony, these being taken, died, as was thought, through the great toyle they had taken: night drawing on, our men gaue themselves to rest in a wood, intending the next day to take their iourney toward Poitiers, and by the way they were certified that the French king, with great provision prepared himselfe to battell, and drew nigh to our tentes: the prince therfore committed the halward of the armie to the Carles of Warwicke and Drford, the middle ward was guided by the Prince, and the reerward was led by the Carles of Salisburie and Suffolke. In all the whole armie of the Prince there was not aboue foure thousand men of armes, one thousand armed souldiours, and two thousand Archers. The pompous nobility of the Frenchmen drew nigh, greatly disdainning the small company of the English men, for they had in number eight thousand fighting souldiours, they had also

seuen Antients. At this matter a great many of our men murmured, because of late a great part of our army was sent to defend Calcoigne. There was among the Frenchmen a certaine Scot called William Douglas, a man of great force and practise in the warres: this man did the French King make knight, and because he knew he would be a deadly enemy to the Englishmen, he gladly hearkened to his aduices. This William was captaine ouer two hundred Scots: these men vnderstood well that it was the custome of the Englishmen in those dayes to fight on foote, in which point they folowed the Scots, and the Scot also prouoked the French King and other French men to fight in like manner. The French King obeying his foolish counsell, gladly agreed vnto his sayings, whereupon he sent light horsemen into the Citty, that they should suffer no man to make any chase, but onely 500. horsemen wel appointed to come out against the archers, in the beginning of the conflict, and to run them ouer and to tread them vnder their horse feet: but these performed not that which was commaunded them, as it appeared by the sequelle thereof. The armies being set in a readinesse on both sides for to fight earely on Sunday in the morning which was notable sayre, behold there came the Cardinall of Petrargozen, and charged the Prince, in the name of God who was crucified, that it might please him to deferre the warre for a time, both for ecclesiasticall peace, and also for the sparing of Christian blood, and to the end there might be a treatie had of peace, the which he promised should be performed with great honour on both sides. The Prince neither feared nor refused peace but modestly agreed to the request of this Father. All this day now being appointed for the obtaining of peace, the armie of the Frenchmen increased by the number of a thousand men of armes, and also of other. On the morrowe after, the Cardinall came againe from the French King, in his behalfe to request a truce, which should endure for one whole yeere, the which the Prince denyed, yet at the importunate sute of that Cardinall, he graunted a truce to continue till Christmas next comming. Therefore the Cardinall returning to the French King, requested him of pledges for the truce, but the Marshall Dawdenam, Geoffrey de Charney and Douglas the Scot, perswaded him that by common reason it could not come to passe that the Englishmen should at that time preuaile, and especially, because they were but fewe, and in a strange country, and wearied out miserably with their toyle in trauell, and therefore not able to indure so great a number of the Frenchmen of France, who stood in defence of their owne land. The Prince of Wales being certified, that the captaines of the French, would haue no kind of peace, but such as they could get by force of armes, and calling his men together, he made to them an Oracion first in general, and then to his Archers as foloweth: your manhood (saith he) hath binallwaies knowne to me, in great dangers, which sheweth that you are not degenerate from true sonnes of English men, but to be descended from the blood of them which heretofore were vnder my fathers Dukedome, and his predecessor Kings of England, vnto who no labor was painefull, no place inuincible, no ground vnpassable, no hill (were it neuer so high) inaccessible, no tower vnscalable, no army impenetrable, no armed souldiour, or whole host of men was forinwardable. Their lively couragiousnesse tamed the Frenchmen, the Cipzians, the Syracussians, the Calabzians, & the Palestines, and brought vnder the stiffe necked Scots, & vnruly Irishmen, yea, and the Welchmen also, which could well endure all laboz, Occasion, time, and dangers, maketh of fearefull, very strong an skoute, & both many times of dull witted men make wittie: honour also, and loue of the Countrey, and the desire of the rich spoyle of the Frenchmen, both stirre you vp to follow your fathers steps. Wherefore followe your Antientes, and wholly be intentiue to follow the commandement of your Captaines as well in minde as in body, that if victorie come with life, we may still continue in firme frendship together, hauing alwayes one will, and one minde: but if enuious fortune (which God forbide) should let vs at this present, to runne the race of all flesh, and that we ende both life and labour together, be you sure that your names shall not want eternall fame and heauenly ioy, and we also with these gentlemen our companions, will drinke of the same cuppe that you shall doe, vnto whom it shall be an eternall glozy and name, to haue wonne the nobilitie of France: but to be overcome (as God forbide) is not to be ascribed vnto the danger of time, but to the courage of the men. Hauing spoken these wordes, he perceiued that there was a hill hard by which was planted on the top with hedges and ditches, the inside whercof was very plaine, and a pasture fielde on the one side thereof, with many rough bushes, and on the other side it was all planted with vines, and the residue was plaine, in the top whereof he did imagine the armie of the French to lye betwixt our men and the Hill. There were great and lowe valleys, and a piece of Parish ground. One company of the Prince finding out a narrowe passage, entred the valley and toke the hill, where among the bushes they hid themselves, taking the aduantage of the place. The fielde wherein our men lay, to witte, the barwarde and iniddlewarde, was deuided from the plaine where the French armie lay, with a long hedge and ditch, the one end whereof did reach down to the Parish aforesaid: that of the Hill next the Parish, the Earle of Warwicke kept, Captaine of the barwarde. In the upper part of the hedge, toward the hanging of the hill, there was a great gap, from the which a stoness cast stode our rereward, ouer the which the Earle of Salisbury was Captaine. Our enemies perceyuing our Princes Antient to be displayed, and oftentimes to be remoued from place to place, and by reason of the Hill to be sometime quiste out of sight, they iudged that the Prince fled; yet Douglas the Scot and Marshall de Clarimount, said that it was not so, but Marshall Dawdenam being deceined in his owne opinion, thought otherwise, crying out still to follow & chase the Prince now fleeing, and with him also Douglas, to the intent to gette preferment and a worthy name of his new warfare: But Clarimount to wash away the euill opinion which was conceiued of him touching his fidelitie, was the more beehement to perswade them forward, for vnto them the charge of the barward was deputed: before these went out, the fashion was, certaine to chase and to iusse, against whom certaine that were vnder the Hill of our barward came to meete Marshall Dawdenam, who staying to see the ende of the iussing, kept himselfe from encountering.

Wales his

encountring. In the meane time Clarimount thinking to come out by the gap in the hedge, and so to come at the backe of our barwarde, and to compasse them in, met with the Earle of Salisburie, who perceiving his coming and purpose, suspected his whole intent, and so they which governed our rearward, making haste to take the gap, and keepe the enemy from passing that way sustained the first charge of the battell. Then began a terrible meeting betwixt the armed men, who laid on load with swoordes and speares, neither did the Archers slacke their dutie, but lying in safe trenches, start by above the ditch and shot over the hedge, prevailing more with their arrowes then they did that fought in armes: thus our rearward slaying the enemies, who came stragling to the gap, and the barward which lay on the hanging of the hill toward the parish being governed by the Earle of Warwike, were alwayes readie and met with the frenchmen, beating them downe. The Archers of the barward were placed in the parish, out of daunger from the Horsesmen, yet for all that they did prevaille there somewhat, for the Horsesmen were appointed to no other purpose, but to overrunne the Archers. The Earle of Orford considering the discommoditie that might ensue thereof, departed from the Princes warde, and leading with him the Archers, set them on the one side of the frenchmen, commaunding them to shote at the hinder parts of the Horses, by meanes whereof the horses being gauld and wounded, fell to tumbling with them that sat on their backs, or els turned backe & ran upon them that followed after, making great slaughter upon their owne masters. The hoesmen being thus beaten backe, the Archers retired towards the place from whence they came, shooting & gawling the sides of the frenchmen which fought right over against them: by this time the force and beate of the battell began to be in prime, when as the Earles of Warwike & Salisburie, like fierce Lions, endeoured of purpose which of them should dung the land of Boyters most with frenchmens blood. Neither was the wise Counseller Thomas Dafford of Suffolke idle at that season, who right worthily in all his acts behaved himselfe, being expert and skilfull in activitie. For he continually running from warde to warde, and into all troupes and companies, comforted and stirred them up with good words to doe well, having a great regard that the youthfull sort of lustie souldiers being too bolde upon their good hearts and courage, should not without regard goe out too farre, and placed the Archers at sundry times to great advantages, and oftentimes as leysure would suffer him, he would encourage by the minds of the souldiers. Clarimount was slaine, William Douglas also being wounded fled, having with him a selve Scottes of his bande, with Archebald Douglas his brother: our men retyring, put themselves in good aray, and our barward and middle warde ioyned themselves together, by and by there marcheth forth a newe armie of the frenchmen, the which the eldest sonne of the french king Dolphin of Aenna, brought forth. The order and aray of this armie was more terrible & fierce then the shew of that which was last oppressed, yet for all that could it not make our men afraid, who were sharpe set, and very desirous of honour, and also of reuenge, both for themselves, and their fellows, which a little before were slaine and wounded. And therefore boldly they goe to ft on both sides, making shewes and noises, crying out, Saint George to barrow, or Saint Denis be for vs. Within a while they were come to fight man to man, and every man ready to die fight now to saue their liues, neither doth the Lion make the wolfe more afraid, or y Tiger is more terrible to the simple beast, then our lusty gentlemen were to their enemies, who chased them, and slue them like as the wolues chase and kill sheepe. And though that this battel withstod our men more then the first, yet, after they had lost a great many of their men, they had such a deuile, that they saued many, & yet, not by running away, but by a faire retreat, which the Frenchmen are accustomed to vse. But our men considering, that the victorie of the fiede was doubtfull, as long as the French King might be in pzeence with his armie, who lay there halfe hid in a Walley, they would not after ward, when they had chased any that fled, goe out of the fiede, but the worthy man Maurice Barkeley, sonne of Thomas Barkley, had no regard thereunto, who for the space off two houres together with his men, neuer spared, but would be still in the forefront of the battell, inuading his enemies with the first. This Maurice being in the middell of the Dolphins gard sowd blowes among them, first with a speare, then with a swozd, and at length being all alone compassed with the multitude, and sorely wounded, he was taken prisoner. In the meane time our men caried those which were wounded of their campe, and laid them vnder bushes and hedges out of the way, other hauing spent their weapons toke the speares & swozdes from them whom they had ouercome: and the archers lacking arrowes, made halt to drawe them from poze wretches that were but halfe dead: there was not one of them al, but either he was wounded or quite wearied with great labour, except 400. me who keeping the chiefe standert, were appointed to mete the French K. The Dolphin being thus put to flight, one came to the French K. and said, my Lord K. the fiede is fallen to the Englishmen, and your eldest son hath withdrawn himselfe: vnto whom the French K. answered with an oth, that he would not that day forsake y field vnlesse he were taken or slaine, and so by that meanes caried away by force: wherefore the antient-bearers are commanded to march for wards, after whom folloved two great companies of armed men into a wide field, the wing themselves to our men, & stroke a great feare into their heartes, in so much that they were out of hope to conquer any more. The which thing a man of great wisdom standing by y Prince signified with a howling voice, (saying alas we poze wretches are ouercome,) but the prince hauing a great trust & saith in Christ, checked him saying, thou liest thou dastardly fellow, for thou canst not say that we can be ouercome as long as I liue. Capitaine de la Buche, a noble man in all affaires as sone as he perceined the armie of the French King, marching forth of their tentes, asking licence of the prince departed away with 1r. souldiours, & a hundred Archers, whom many of our men thought to haue fled away, therefore our souldiours (excepting the chiefe Capitaines) being quite out of hope of victorie, committed themselves wholly to the mercy of God. Then the Prince commanded his Antient bearger Sir Walter Woodland, to march forward toward his enemies, mies, and with a few fresh men he toynd battell with the great armie of the French King: by and by they sounde their trumpets, one giuing answere to another, they made such a noyse, that the walles of Woypers sounded with the Echo thereof like a wood, in such sort that a man would haue thought that the hills had bellowed out to the vallets, and that the cloudes had giuen forth a most terrible thunder, to the which there wanted no cruel lightnings, whilest the aire shone on the bright armour & speares dashing against shining harness. Then came on the cruell company of crosbowmen making a darknes in the skies with the multitud of quarrels which they shot, against whom came a worthy company of English bowmen: out flies also darts of Ash which met with the enemye a far off: but the French army being full of diuers troupes and many armed men defending their breasts with their shields, passed forward against their enemies: wherefore our Archers hauing emptied their quiers in vaine, being armed onely with swordes and targets, are faine to encounter with them that were laden with armour. Then bestirreth himself the worthy Prince of Wales, cutting and hewing the Frenchmen with a sharpe sword. In the meane time Captaine de la Buche marcheth a compasse about, vnder the hanging of the hill, which he with the Prince a little before forsooke, and priuily compassing about the fildes, at the length cometh close vnder the place where the French Campe lay, from thence he ascended to the toppe of the Hill that way, which the Frenchmen had beaten with their trauaile, and so sodainly breaking forth vnlooked for, and shewing by the ensigne of Saint George that he was our friend, the Prince with great courage giueth a fresh charge on the French armie, being desirous to breake their ranks, before the Captaine aforesayde, should set on the side of the battayle. The Prince lustily encountring with his enemies goeth into the middle of the throng, and where hee seeth most company, there hee layeth about him on every side.

In the meane time on every side, his friends which serued with Captaine de la Buche, were at the backes of the enemies, beating downe and killing without pittie, and the Archers also placed for the purpose shot so thicke, wounding the backes and sides of the Frenchmen, in such sort, that the fourme of the battaile was quite spoiled, neither could they put themselves in order or aray any more. This was the courage of the Prince who at the length thrusteth thorow the throngs of them that guarded the French King, then should you see an Antient begonne to nod and stumble, the bearers of them to fall downe, the blood of haues and Princes ran mingled together into the fountains which were nigh. In like sorte the Boze of Coznewall rageth, who seeketh to haue none other way to the French Kings Standard, then by blood onely: but when they came there, they met with a company of stout men to withstand them, the Englishmen fight, the Frenchmen also lay on, but at length Fortune making haste to turne her wheele, the Prince preaseth forward on his enemies, and like a fierce Lion beating downe the proud, he came to the yelding vp of the French King. The Frenchmen being scattered abroad in the fildes of Woypers perceyuing that the Standard with the
f. w. j. edeluce

flowedeluce was beaten downe, fled with all speede towards the Towne, which was not farre off: the English men percepuing them to be fleeing, though themselves were either soze wounded oz wearied, followed them in chalc euen to the gates of Doyters, where in a great skirmish and very dangerous, they slew a great number of Frenchmen. At the last our men being called backe by retreat with the sound of trumpet, and assembling togither, there were diuerse pavilions and tents set vp in the fields, and the whole company being thzoughly comforted with this victorie, gaue their whole endeavour to prouide for them that were wounded, for the quiet rest of them that were wearied, for safe keeping of them that were taken prisoners, and for the refreshing of the that were almost famished, until they had full vnderstanding who and how many were wanting: Among them which were found halfe dead, was found the Lord James Dawdley, by reason of his broad buckler, and being caried in the armes of his souldiours, was brought to the Prince lodging, and the Prince himselfe rose from his supper, and came to him, and caused him to be stripped and laid in a soft bed, and being somewhat better com to his remembraunce, the Prince comforted him, swearing to him that he had the French King yelded vnto him, which newes when the languishing Noble man heard, he straightwayes refused. The Prince returning to the French King, willed him not to denie that to be a worthise dede of his that rose from his supper to comfort him that was almost dead, who spared not his owne blood to purchase victorie. After that they hauing had some talke concerning the warres which James Dawdeley made, the French King said that amongst all other Route Champions which valiantly that day behaued themselves, he did greatly wonder at the noble deedes of that Knight, and he spake not much moze in all his supper, but what he spake to the Prince, who comforted his noble pray. Such like words, it is said that the French King spake: Although it be our chance to fall into an euerlasting sorrow, yet for all that we thought it good to refraine from the same by a kind of measure, for though we be vnder subiection by law and right of warre vnder our noble cousin, yet are we not as rascals, oz faint hearted runne awapes, oz taken lying hid close in a corner, but after the manner of the fiede by the ende and successe of warre, where we were as ready to dye as liue for iustice sake. And in the same fiede were many rich men taken, whose liues were reserved for ransome, the faint hearted and lewd chased away, but the worthiest and stoutest were spoiled of their liues. This battell of Doytiers was fought on the ninetenth day of September.

The next day after the battell, all the prisoners were numbred, to wit, the French King, also Phillip his sonne, the Archbishop of Senon, the Earle of Pontue, the Earle of Longuile, the Earle of Ewe, the Earle of Tankerulle, the Earle Daunter, the Earle of Wendadour, the Earle of Slauncer, the earle of Madrimonut, the Earle of Wandome, the Earle of Japny, the Earle Don Martin, the Earle of Selabuse, the Earle of Sasso, Vicount Perbon, the Lord Daubeny, Marshall Daubdenam, the Lord Guinchard de Angle, Seneschal de Seintong, the Lord Poyes Paluinmet, the Lord Leonard de Cusi-

Tigre, the Lord Dambopd Seneſſhal of Annar, the Lord Tower, the Lord Wars, the Lord Duruall, the Lord of the towne of Crnel, the Lord Maugeler, the Lord Blanke, the Account de Belſmount, and the Lord of Sulp: there were alſo the bodles founde of many that were ſlaine, as the Duke of Burbon, the Duke Daſſnes, the Conſtable of France, Marſhall de Garimount, the Lord Geſtreſſey de Charney, the Lord Wounce, the Biſhop of Chaloner, the Lord of Laundbas, the Lord Kipemount, the Lord Chaneny, the Lord Jocle, the Lord ſpele, the Lord Auger, the Lord de Mount John, the Lord Dargenton, the Lord Grole, the Lord Ruas, the Lord Rocheſchichelward, the Lord de Wilem. The Prince bought all the priſoners and captiues of them that kept them, and carried them with him to Burdeaur, there to remaine in ſafe cuſtodie, during his abode there.

Edward Prince of Wales returning into England with Iohn the French King, Philip his ſonne, and many other priſoners, arrived at Plimouth on the ſixt of May, and the ſoure and twentieth of May entered London with them, where he was receiued with great honour of the Citizens, and ſo conueyed to the Kings pallace at Weſtminſter, where the King ſitting in his eſtate in Weſtminſter hall, receiued them, and after conueyed the French King to a lodging, where he lay a ſeaſon: and after the ſaid French King was lodged in the Hauop, (which then was a pleaſant place belonging to the Duke of Lancaſter.) In the winter following were great and royall Juſts holden in Smithfield at London, where many knightly fights of armes were don, to the great honour of the King and Realme, at the which were preſent, the Kings of England, France, and Scotland, with many noble eſtates of all thoſe kingdomes, whereof the moze part of the ſtrangers were priſoners.

After this taking of King Iohn of France, Engliſhmen (which beſore were bearded and the haire of their heads ſhort rounded) then uſed long haire on their heads, and their beards to be ſhauen.

Henry Picard Mintner, Maior of London, in one day did ſumptuouſly feaſt Edward King of England, Iohn King of France, the King of Cipres (then arrived in England) David King of Scots, Edward Prince of Wales, with many noble men and other, and after the ſaid Henry Picard kept his hal againſt all comers whoſoeuer, that were willing to play at dice and hazard. In like manner the Lady Margaret his wife did alſo keepe her Chamber, to the ſame intent. The King of Ciprus playing with Henry Picard in his hall, did winne of him fifty marks, but Henry being very ſkilful in that arte, altering his hand did after win of the ſame King, the ſame fiftie markes, and fiftie markes moze, which whē the ſame King began to take in ill part, although he diſsembled the ſame, Henry ſaid vnto him, My Lord a King be not agreued, I couet not your gold but your play, ſo: I haue not bid you hither that I might graue you, but that amongſt other things I might trie your play, and gaue him his money againe, plentifully beſtowing of his own amongſt the retinue: beſides, he gaue many rich gifts to the King and other nobles and Knights, which dined with him, to the great glorie of the Citizens of London in thoſe dayes.

John Beauchampe champe, buried in Paules.

Iohn of Gaunt the Kings sonne (by dispensation) toke to wife Blanch, daughter of Henry Duke of Lancaster his kinswoman, Iohn Beauchampe Constable of Douer, warden of the portes, Knight of the Garter (sonne to Edward de Beauchampe, Earle of Marwike, and brother to Thomas also Earle of Marwike) deceased, and was buried on the south side of the middle Ile in the body of Saint Pauls Church in London; a faire Monument of him remaineth there, by many ignorant people, misnamed, to be of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, who lyeth honorably intombed at Saint Albons.

The French King vnder colour of peace, offered to King Edward Flaunders, Picardy, Aquitaine, and other lands, which the Englishmen had ranged throught and spoyled, for the performance whereof, messengers were sent into France, but the Frenchmen would not performe the offer, wherefore King Edward being angry with a nauie of ships passed the sea to Calets, where diuiding his army into thre parts he committed one company to Henry Duke of Lancaster, another to Prince Edward, and the third he reserued to himselfe, and so passed into Burgundy.

King Edward
invaded Burgundie.
Frenchmen scattered at Winchelsea.

In the Lent season, the Normans with a small nauy arriued at Winchelsea, and partly brent the towne, and slew such as did withstand them: wherefore the Prelates of England assembled from all parts in armour to withstand than, but when they had prepared themselves to battell, the French were gone, leaving behind them two of their ships, which stuck fast in the land, and 200. of their men.

King Edward with his power rode through France, by Picardy, Artois, Roan, Champaine, & so to Britaine, destroying the countrey before him. And here is to be noted, that the 14. day of April, and the morrow after Easter day, king Edward with his host lay before the Citie of Paris, which day was full darke of mist and haile, and so bitter cold, that many men died on their horse backs with the cold, wherefore unto this day it hath bene called the Blacke Monday. The king of Navarre bered soze the marches of Normandy. Thus was the realme of France miserably beset on all sides. At the last, a final peace was concluded on this condition, that king Edward should haue to his possession, the countreies of Gascoigne, Guyen, Poitiers, Limosin, Valentle, Grantes, Cales, Guisnes, and diuers other Lordships, Castles, Townes, and all the landes to them belonging, without knowledge of any soueraigntie or subiection for the same. This peace being confirmed by writing and by oath, king Edward came into England, and so straight to the towler to see the French king, where he appointed his ransome to be thre millions of floreneces, and so delivered him of all imprisonment, and brought him with great honour to the Sea, who then sailed ouer into France.

It. Edward the 24 of Januarie began a Parliament at Westminster, where the forme of the agreement was read, and allowed of all estates, where the king on the last of Januarie caused his nobles to sweare to hold and keepe the said agreement, especially those as well Prelates as other that were not at Cales, where he swore, and other that were there with him.

And on the first of february following, the king restored to the Priors allens their houses, lands, tenements, &c. as by his patents may appeare in effect as followeth. Edward by the grace of God king of England, Lord of Ire land, and of Aquitaine, to all by these presents, &c. Although the Priorie of mountacute, in the county of Somerset (by reason of the warres betwene vs and France) with all the landes, tenements, fees, aduowsons, together with the goods and cattels belonging to the same, hath ben of late taken into our hands, and by vs farmed & rented forth, as appeareth by diuers patents. Now therfore, since peace is betwixt vs and the Noble Prince, our most deare brother, the king of France, we for the honour of God, and holy Church, restore to the said Prior, the Priorie, with all the lands, tenementes, fees, aduowsons: and whatsoeuer else belonging to the same, to hold the same, in as free manner as they held it before. And withall, forgiue and release all arrerages of rents which might be due vnto vs, by reason of any former grants. In witnesse, &c. the 6. of february the 35. yere of our raigne.

The like letters of restitution had the houses (in the patent) vndernamed, to wit, Northampton, Arundel, Cameringham, Writton, Wissewel, &c. to the number of one hundred and tenne in England, besides them in Ireland, Normandie, and the parts of France. All which houses were cleane suppressed and dissolved, with many moze by king Henry the fift.

The third of Aprill was bozne at Burdeaur, Richard sonne to Edward the blacke Prince, which Richard was after king of England by the name of Richard the second.

There was then a priest in England, called William Wicham, who was so great with the king that all things were done by him, & without him nothing was done. And so when the Bishoprick of Winchester was void, the king of England at the desire of the said priest, wrote to the Duke of Burbon, that he would for his sake, make such sute to Pope Urban, that his chaplein might haue the bishoprick of Winchester, promising the Duke in his dosings, to intreat him right courteously for his imprisonment & hostage. When the duke of Burbon saw the B. of Englands messengers & his letter, he was therof right ioyous: and shewed all the manner to the French king, who counselled him to go to the Pope for the same, & so he did, for he went to Auignion to the Pope, who was not as the gone to Rome, & so the duke made his request to the Pope, and he granted him, & gaue him the Bishoprick of Winchester at his pleasure, so that the king of England would be favourable to him in the composition for his deliuerance, that the foresaid William Wicham should haue the said Bishoprick. When the duke of Burbon returned into France, & so into England, and there treated with the king & his counsel for his deliuerance, or he would shew his bulls from the Pope. The king of England loued so well this priest, that the Duke of Burbon was deliuered quite, and paid 20000. Frankes. And so Sir William Wicham was B. of Winchester, and Chancelloz of England.

Paulus Iouius.
Leonell Duke of Clarence marrieth and diedh.

In the moneth of Appril, Leonell Duke of Clarence, with a chosen company of the English nobilitie went towards Millaine, there to marry with Violentis the daughter of Galeasius the second of that name, Duke of Millaine, of which marriage Paulus Iouius writeth thus, vpon the life of the said Galeasius: By the meanes of peace being obtained, and Barnabe with no lesse earnest endeavour seeking by force and armes to recouer the Principedome of Bononie, as taken from him by fraud, and detained by insury, Galeasius desired to fortifie himselfe with forraign affinitie, glorious in deed, in princely pompe, but in euent to him and his vnfortunate, matching his sonne Iohn Galeasius with Isabell daughter to Charles the french king, and his daughter with Leonell Duke of Clarence, sonne of the king of England, to whom hauing receiued 200000. florences of gold for a dowry by the marriage of Violentis, the Cities of Monsregalis, and Alba Pompeis submitted themselves. And Isabell which came to Millaine was so troublesome to her father in law, that she cost him 200000. florences, although the yelding of the Towne of Petetars; and the title of that most honourable name had been giuen to her new husband in part of her dowrye. Moreover, at the comming of Leonell, such abundance of treasure was in most bounteous manner spent, in making most sumptuous feasts, setting forth statelie sightes, and honouring with rare gifts aboue two hundred Englishmen, which accompanied his sonne in law, as it seemed to surpassse the greatnesse of most wealthy Princes: for in the banquet whereat Francis Petrarch was present, amongst the chiefeest guestes, there were aboue thirtie courses of seruice at the table, and betwixt euery course, as many presents of wonderous price intermixed, all which Iohn Galeasius, chiefe of the choise youth, bringing to the table, did offer to Leonell.

And such was the sumptuousnesse of that banquet, that the meats which were brought from the table, would sufficiently haue serued 10000. men: but not long after, Leonell lining with his new wife, whilest after the manner of his owne countrey, as forgetting or not regarding his change of ayze, hee addicted himselfe ouermuch to vntimely banquettings, spent and consumed with a lingering sicknesse, died at Alba. Afterward Violantis was married to

The 15. of August died Quene Philip, wife to Edward the thirde at Windsor, and was buried at Westminster.

Quenesborough, Kingston upon Hull, and S. Botolphs, alias Boston, were made Staples by Parliament.

The kings sonne Iohn Duke of Lancaster, and Humfrey Bohan Earle of Hereford, with a great armie went into Fraunce, where they little prevailed, because an huge Army of Frenchmen had pitched their Tents vpon the toppe of Chalke hill, nere vnto Caleis, so strongly, that they could not be set on without great losse and damage: but shortly after, Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwick, arrived at Caleis with a number of chosen souldiers, at whose coming, the French men leauing their tents and victuals, fled away, neuertheless, he passed forth, spoiling and wasting the Ile of Caws with fire and sword, but as he returned toward Caleis, he fell sicke, whereof he died, and the other captaines returned without honour.

King Edward borrowed of the Prelates and other, many great summes of money, saying, he would bestow the same in defence of the Church & realme, but about Midsummer he sent a great army into France, whereof Sir Robert Knowles was generall, a man, who before time had fortunately handled the beyond sea wars, so long as they were ruled by his counsel: but toward winter, the yong Lords said they ought not to be subiect to him who was not so noble of birth, as they, and so deuising themselves into diuers companies, Sir Robert Knowles departed into Britaine to his owne castles which he had conquered: The Lords being so deuised, the Frenchmen set vpon them, toke prisoners whom they liked, and tooke the residue.

A great part of Gascoigne fell from the prince, because of the strange cractions he laid vpon them: also sickness encreasing vpon him, he returned into England with his wife and his sonne Richard, and resigned into his fathers hands the gouernement of Gascoigne.

The monasterie of Abingdon, five miles from Oxford, was spoiled by them of Oxford, together with the artificers of Abingdon.

In a Parliament at Westminster in the first weeke of Lent, it was ordained that the great Charter & Charter of the forest, should be kept in all points. Also in the same Parliament, the Clergy of the realme granted to the king an aide for the warres in France, of fiftie thousand pound to be paid in the same yere, vnto the leuping of which summe, Chauntries prestes were taxed, according to the leuping that they received by the yere, also final benefices which were neuer taxed, &c. This yere deceased the gentle Knight Syr Walter de Maine in the Citie of London, wherof all the Barons of England were right fory, for the truth and god counsaile that they had alwayes seene and heard in him: he was buried with great solemnity in the Monastery of Charterhouse Monkes, which he had founded besides London, and at the day of his Obsequie, there was present the King and al his childzen, with the Prelates, Barons and Knights of England. His lands both in England and beyond the sea sell to the Earle of Penbroke, who had to wife the Lady Anne, his daughter and heire. Also the valiant Knight Sir William Molineux, who had long serued in Fraunce, and was made Knight Banneret by the blacke Prince, at the battell of Passars, now returning out of France died at Canterbury, about the feast of S. Iohn Baptist. Also Sir Iohn Mandeuile Knight, a man worth the memozy, bozne in S. In this his voyage he painefullly visited the Countreies of Scythia the greater & the lesser, Armenia, Aegypt, both the Countreies of Libya, Arabia, Syria, Media, Mesopotamia, Persia, Grecia, Illyricum, Tartaria, and other kingdomes: finally hauing attayned the knowledge of diuers tongues, lest the varietie, and wonders of so many and so great things as he had seene with his eyes, and bozne away by memorie, should be utterly drowned in oblivion, he wrote exactly in the Latine, French, and English tongues, these woorkes following, viz. his Itinerarie of thrie and thirtie yeres, of the manerples of the woorld, and the description of Countreies: being returned into England, and noting the cuill abuses of that his age and time, the godly gentleman would say, (in these our times now it may be trulier said then euer afore) that vertue is laid aside, the Church is troden downe, the Cleargie erreth, the deuill raigeth, simony beareth sway, &c.

At length he died at Leiden, the 17. of Nouember, 1371. and was buried in the Abbey of the Williamites, thus farre Bale. To the confirmation whereof Abraham Ortelius in his Itinerarium, professing to haue seene the monument of the said Sir Iohn Mandeuill in the citie of Leiden, setteth downe the inscription thus.

Epitaph of Sir
Iohn Mandeuill.

Here lieth the Noble man Sir Iohn de Mandeuille, otherwise surnamed Knight at the beard, Lord de Campdi, borne in England, a professor of Phisick, a very deuout man in prayer, and a most bountifull bestower of his goods on the poore, who after he had trauielled almost ouer the whole world, ended his life at Leiden, the yeere of our Lord 1371. the seauenteenth of Nouember.

This is the inscription in the stone, sayeth Ortelius, in which there is grauen, the Image of an armed man, with a lion at his fete, with a two forked beard, at his head a hand blessing, with these words in French, You that passe by, for charitie say prayers for me.

The shield of his armes was voyde, they said there was within it a plate, and his armes ingrauen therein, to wit, a Lion Argent, with a red crescent at his breast in a blew field, with a border indented Or: there was shewed his kniues, his furniture for horse, and his spurres, which he vsed in his trauailes through the woorld.

John Duke of Lancaster entred Fraunce with a strong power, and passed through the Realme without battell, but in the desertes and mountaines of Aluerne, for lacke of victualles, many of his armie died: from thence, he went to Burdeaur, and brought scanty forty horses backe with him: it was commonly talked that he lost thirtie thousand horses in that unluckie voyage. It was a great miserie to see the poore state of the men of warre, such as were knights of great wealth in their Countrey, having lost men and horses, were glad to beg from doze to doze, and found no reliefe, for the Countrey was destroyed, and not manured, by reason whereof, such dearth was in that Countrey, that victuals could scant be gotten for any money: the Duke yet wintered there. The tenth of Aprill following, a day of battell was appoynted betwixt him and the Duke of Anjou at Tholouse. In the meane time, truce was taken til the twentieth of May next following, but the King of England knew nothing of it: When the day came, a great power of armed men for the French appeared, the which the Duke of Anjou had assembled, but yet that day passed without battell, to the great shame and reproch of the English, for the Frenchmen said, they were ready in fiesde the day appointed to looke for their coming, that came not at all, wherefore they spake many reprochfull words against the Englishmen, calling them false cowards, and heartlesse. And such was the end of that journey.

The commons also requested to haue remoued out of the Kings house, a certaine proud woman called Alice Pierce, who by ouermuch familiaritie that she had with the King, was cause of much mischief in the realme, she exceeding the manner of women, fate by the Kings Iustices, and sometimes by the Doctors in the Consistories, perswading and dissuading in defence of matters, and requesting things contrary to lawe and honestie, to the great dishonour of the King.

This yere in the moneth of June, the seruants and tenants of the Earle of Warlike maliciously rose against the Abbey and Couent of Guesham, and their tenants, doing their worst to destroy the same for ever, beating their seruants, & killing some of them, & comming to the manors of the Monkes, they brake down the pales of their parks & burnt them, slew their deere, they brake the hedges of the pondes & fish poles, let out the water, toke the fish, and did many other damages, minding to haue destroyed the house, and ouerthrowen the wals if the King had not sent commandement to y<sup>e</sup> Earle to restraine these malefactours, and troublers of the peace, thus for feare of the King, and mediation of frends, a peace was made, but no sufficient recompence, for the damage was much more then y<sup>e</sup> parties were able to make amends for: because of this presumption of the Earle, the King put him out of his counsell, & would not be gouerned by y<sup>e</sup> other Lords that were appointed therunto by parliament, but he sent for the Duke of Lancaster againe to gouerne the realme, by which occasion all they that befoze were banished the Court, came againe, as the Lord Latimere, Alice Pierce, and other, whose counsell he followed euen to the end of his life. The foresaid Alice is made so familiar with the king, as also her companions, that is to say, the Lord Latimere, and Sir Richard Scirie, that at their becke, the King promised all matters of the Realme to be disposed, whereupon they being desirous to be reuenged vpon their accusers, ceased not until by the kings and Dukes authoritie they had gotten Sir Peter de la More, to the kings court, whom without any answer, against all iustice, they sent to the Castle of Newmarke, there to be imprisoned. The Duke now laboured against William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, taking occasion by al wayes & meanes he possibly could to indamage him, at the last amongst other things that he objected against him, he charged him to haue ben false vnto the King, at what time he was Lord chancellor, & although the bishop in declaring of his innocencie was ready to bring forth for himselfe both sufficient reasons and witness, yet notwithstanding he caused him to be condemned without making answer, William Skipwith being Justice, and by the Kings authoritie toke from him all the temporall goods of his Bishopricke, and that he might get the peoples fauour, he moued the King to giue the said goods to the Prince called Richard of Burdeaur, and so he vsed the yong Princes name for his owne helpe. Parliament at London.

The Duke vsing the kings authoritie, directed warrants to al the Lords, & Barons of the Realme, that after Christmas on Monday, 15. dayes after S. Hillary, they should come to the Parliament at London, wherein the matters of the Realme were to be talked of. To this Parliament came Richard of Burdeaur the Prince, with a great number of Noble men, and Knights, whom the Londoners at his coming presented with diuers honourable giftes, and the Duke of Lancaster also, seemed to honoz him aboue the rest, placing him in the Kings seate, & taught him to demaund, that they would giue the King two tenths in one yere, or els of al the marchandise sold in the realme of England for one yere xii. d. of euery pound, of euery firehouse one peny, and of euery knights six, one pound of siluer, & presently the Duke prosecuted the demand, saying that of necessity one of those poynts ought to be granted, for that the enemies had now proclaimed warre, & would inuade the realme. The knights of the Parliament, whom the Duke had made at his pleasure, desired respite y they might deliberately answer him, for all the other knights that in the last Parliament had stoutly stand with the communalty, he had caused to be removed, except twelue whom hee could not remoue, a day was appointed them. Of the greater part, master Hungerford was elected to deliuer their answer, who was a knight very familiar with the duke, and was his Steward. Those few whom we haue said to haue remained, endeouored that Sir Peter de la More might deliuer their answer, and also to answer all objections that should be laid against him in ptesence of the Lords. And further, if he should be found faultie, to submit himselfe to the iudgement of the noble men present, but the knights preualled nothing in their sake. For when one of the knights vided the matter more then other, he was willed to holde his peace, otherwise it might cost him his life. Whilist these things were in handling, a subdole was demaunded for the king of the whole Cleargie. They therefore treating ting of this matter, first made a common complaint befoze the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the iniury offered vnto their brother William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, which was also iniury vnto them al, and to the whole libertie of the Church, wherfoze they affirmed they would not treat of other matters, vntill all the number of the Cleargie were together, for they pitying his fall, were moued against the Archbishop, thinking him a great hired man for the Duke, and notwithstanding the Archbishop affirmed, the foresaid Bishop to be prohibited by the King, not to come nere vnto his presence, yet least he should be compelled, he sent a commaundement for him, that he should come vnto the Conuocation of the Cleargie at London, who making no delay, came with a small number of seruants, that befoze time was thought to excell all other in multitude attending vpon him, he was ioyfully receiued of his fellow Bishops.

The Cleargie
requireth the renouation of the Bishop of Winchester.

In the meane time the Duke ceased not with his fellowes to imagine how he might bring that to passe, which he had long conceiued in his minde: for he saw that it would be hard for him to obtaine his purpose, the Church standing in his full state, and verie dangerous to attempt publikely to doe those things, the lawes and customes of London being in force, wherfore he laboured first to ouerthrow, as well the liberties of the Church, as of the Citie: for the which cause, he called vnto him a certaine diuine, who many yeeres before in all his acts in the scholes, had inueyed against the Church, for that he had been deprived by the Archbishop of Canterbury from a certaine benefice that he vniustly (as was said) was incumbent vpon within the Citie of Drford, his name was Iohn Wicliffe, who with his disciples, were of the common people called Lollards, they went bare-footed, and basely clothed, to wit, in course russet garments down to the heeles, they preached, especially against Monks, and other religious men that had possessions, &c. Amongst other things, he deuyed the bishop to haue authoritie to excommunicate any person, and that any Priest might absolue such a one as well as the Pope:

The Duke sent for Iohn Wicliffe.

T. Walsingham.

That neither the King, nor other secular Lord could giue any things perpetually to any person of the Church:

That (as he affirmed) in the time of William Rufus it was practised in England, for whom, as for other Kings of the Realme (notwithstanding he toke away the Church goods (the Church of England prayeth, which if she do lawfully, then she doth well: and to say she doth it unlawfully, were absurd.

That the temporall Lords (if they had neede) might lawefully take the goods of such religious persons, to releue their necessities, &c. When he had taught these and many other, not onely in the Scholes at Drford, but also had preached them publikely in London, that he might thereby get the fauour of the Duke and others, whom he had found prone to heare his opinion, not onely Lords, but also certaine Citizens of London, (for he was not onely eloquent, but also seemed to contemne temporall goods, for the loue of eternall riches, and therefore his conuersation was with those religious that had no possessions, and adioyned himselfe vnto the begging Friars, approuing their pouertie, and extolling their perfection) The Duke Alay, and Sir Henry Percy

Percy, commended highly his opinions, and entenuored to extoll his learning and honestie of life aboue all other. Who therfore being thus set forth with their fauour, feared not to spread his doctrine, much more then before, going from Church to Church, and preaching his opinions. Whereupon at length, the Bishops wakened their Archbishop, who sent for this Iohn to come and answer to those things that were spoken of him. And the Duke hearing thereof, sent for foure Doctours of Diuinitie, one of enery order of the begging friars, aduertising them, that with a naturall and olde hate, he pursued the religious persons that had possessions, neither was it difficult to compell the willing friars to ayde him in this point.

Disoord in Pauls church
at London.

Iohn Wickliffe was to appeare before the Bishops on Thursday the nineteenth day of February there to be conuicted, for words that he had spoken, who, after the ninth houre, the Duke, and Sir Henry Percy, and diuers other assisters going before him, was brought forth, not only by common sergeants, but also Sir Henry Percy himselfe, who was chiefe Marshal of England being by the way animated by his fauourers, not to feare the Bishops, neither the concourse of the people, seeing that he was walled in with so many knightes and other: he was brought into Saint Pauls Church, where such a multitude of people was gathered together to heare him, that it was hard for the noblemen to passe through & that he might escape death intended him by many Bishops. And first a dissension being raised betwene the noblemen & Bishops, it was thought his answer should haue been deferred. But when the people being gathered round together, stayed to giue place vnto the noblemen, Sir Henry Percy abusing his authoritie, picked forthwards the people, which the Bishop of London seeing, prohibited him to exercise such authoritie in the Church, saying, that if he had knowen he would haue used himselfe so there, he should not haue come into the Church, if he could haue letted him. Which the Duke hearing, and being offended, protested, that he would exercise such authoritie whether he would or not. When they were come into our Ladies Chappell, the Duke and Barons, with the Archbishop and Bishops sitting downe, the foresaid Iohn was also sent in by Sir Henry Percy, and by him willed to sit downe, for because (said he) he hath much to answer, he hath neede of a better seate. On the other side, the Bishop of London affirmed it to be against reason, and also contrary vnto Lawe, that he should sit, who there was cited to answer before his ordinary: hereupon very contumelious words did arise betwene Sir Henry Percy, and the Bishop, so that the whole multitude began to be troubled, and then the Duke began to reprehend the Bishop with slowe words, and the Bishop to turne the like to the Duke againe: whereupon the Duke being angry that he could not in this strife preuaile, sware that he would pull downe both the pride of him, and of all the Bishops in England, and added, thou trustest (said he) in thy parents, who can profite thee nothing. The Bishop answered, I trust not in my parents, nor in the life of any man, but in God, in whom I ought to trust: then the Duke whispering in his eare, said, he had rather draw him forth of the Church by the haire of the head, then to suffer such things at his hand.

The

The Londoners hearing these words, with a loud voice cryed out swearing they would not suffer their Bishop to be thus injured, and that they would rather lose their lives then their Bishop should be dishonestly used in his Church, or pulled out as was threatened. Their furie was the more increased against the Duke, for that the day before in the Parliament at Westminster, the Duke being president: It was requested in the Kings name that from that day forward there should be no more Mayor of London, according to the ancient custome, but a Captaine should be appointed, and that the Marshall of England, as well in the citie as in other places, might arrest such as offended, with many other things, which were manifestly against the liberties of the Citie: which being once heard John Philpot a worthy Citizen arose, and answered, &c.

The morrow after, the Londoners assembling themselves together, took council upon such demands, as the day before the Lords W. of Woodstocke, and Sir H. Percy had had concerning the creation of a Captaine in the Citie, and of the use of the Marshalls office, &c. Besides of the iniurie that was offered to their Bishop, and other matters: and whilst there was great ado and long talke about these things, there entred into the Citie the Lord Fitzwalter, and Guido Brian, whether to know their minds, or for other wise uncertaine, but the commons scarcely held their hands from beating them that came uncalled for, till at the length they had sworne their coming was not for any hurt unto them or the city. The Lord Fitzwalter having gotten saue at the citizens hands, began his Oration, the effect whereof was, that he being by ancient inheritance Standard bearer to the city, was to take iniuries offered unto them, as unto himselfe, & therefore willing them to looke to their defence, they presently took armes, and ranne with great rage to the Marshalls Inn, they brake vp the gates, and dories, brought out a prisoner gyues & al, wherein his feet were fastned, intending to burne them in the midd of the city, Sir Henry Percy is sought for, the armed men ran by and downe, but all in vaine, for that day he and the Duke were to dine with one Iohn of Pyre, but the Londoners knew it not: For they thought that he and the Duke had ben at the Banoy, and therefore with all haste passed thither, but one of the Dukes Knights seeing these things, in great haste came to the place where the Duke was, and after he had knocked and could not get in, hee saide to Hauerland the Porter, if thou loue my Lord and thy life, open the gate, with which words, he got entry, and with great feare hee telles the Duke, that without the gate were infinite numbers of armed men, and vlesse hee take great heede, that day should be his last. With which words, when the Duke heard them, he leapt so hastily from his officers, that he hurt both his legges against the fourme: wine was offered to his officers, but hee would not drinke for haste, he fledde with his fellowe Sir Henry Percy, no man following them, and entring the Thames neuer stinted rowing untill they came to a house nere the Manor of Kenington (besides Lambeth) where at that time the Princesse was, with the yong Prince, before whom hee made his complaint. The Princesse hauing heard their talke, comforted them, promising sing that she would make a small ende of all those matters.

A priest being taken to be the D. Percy was slaine.

The common people of the Citie not knowing that the Duke was fled, in great fury hastened to the Baner, and a priest chauncing to meete them, asked of some what that busines meant. Wherunto he was answered, that they went to take the Duke and the Lord Percy, that they might be compelled to deliver to them, Sir Peter de la More, whom they uniuersally kept in prison: the Priest said that Peter de la More was a traytour to the King, and was woorth to be hanged. With which words they all cried, this is Percy, this is the traytour of England, his speech betwixt him, though he be disguised in apparel: then ran they all vpon him, striving who should giue him his deaths wound, after they had wounded him, they caried him to prison, where he died. The Bishop of London, William Courtney, hearing that the Citizens hastened to the Baner, left his dinner and met with them, admonishing the to be mindfull of the holy time, (for it was Lent) and for the loue of Christ to leaue off such seditious doings, affirming that he would bring al things that were done against them to good ende. And doubtlesse had not the Bishop asswaged their mad modes, the Duke and the Lord Percy had that day lost their liues, but by the Bishops meanes the matter was pacified for the time, and enery man got him to his owne house. Then were the Dukes armes hanged by reuered in signe of treason, in the most principall streets of the citie, vncertaine by whom: all that ware the Dukes signe or colours, were saue to hide them, conueying them from their necks, into their bosome. The Princeesse (wife to Edward late deceased) desirous to make peace, sent vnto London these Knights, Albert de Vere, Simon Burley, and Lewes Clifford, to perswade them, to make peace with the Duke, vnto whom the Citizens made answer, that they would doe for her hono<sup>r</sup>, whatsoever she had commanded, but yet they enioyned the Knights, to will the Duke, that he should suffer the Bishop of Winchester to come to his answer, and to be tried by his Peeres, and also to permit Peter de la More to answer for himselfe, after the custome of the lawe: and as for the third, they said they would account a traytor wheresoeuer he should be found. The said Knights no other wise then they had heard of the Citizens, reported vnto the Duke with full mouth, wherby they made the Duke very wofull, for wher as they had spoken of a traitor, this (said he) they speake of me, though it be not true.

The Londoners
goe to the King about their liberties.

John Philpot.

The Londoners hauing held a councel about this matter, sent of their chief Citizens, either to iustifie, or to excuse that which had hapned, who suing long to come to the Kings presence, being kept backe by the duke, at length the duke tolde them that the King was very euill at ease, and that his sickness might be increased, if that he were moued to anger, by their speech. But the citizens, whose chiefe man and speaker was Iohn Philpot answered the Duke, that they were not come, by any meane to augment the Kings sicknesse, but rather to mitigate his graue, that he might be strong to defend them. Moreover, they said they were charged not to communicate those matters which they had in commission from the citie vnto any other then vnto their liege Lord the King. At length hauing gotten access, they shewed vnto the King,

how it had been published in the Parliament, that it was his will, that contrary to their liberties, the Mayor should be deposed, and a Captaine created, and other matters in the Parliament, which sounded against their liberties. Also they excused themselves of diuers things which had been done, during the time of the commotion of the communalitie of the citie, saying they were not priuate to any such doing, but y amongst so great a multitude, some lewd people had done such things, neither so great a multitude could be moued by the exhortation of the Mayor, when they were once by together. The King being a little cheered by with their comming, answered, that he would not the diminishing of their liberties, no, he was rather ready, if neede were, to augment them, neither did any such resolutions euer come out of his mouth, and therefore, he willed them not to feare, but to returne and appeale the Citizens, and to keepe them in peace.

In the meane space some men ceased not to make rymes in reproch of the Duke, and to fasten them in diuers places of the Citie, whereby the greater fury of the people might be kindled, the Dukes fame blotted, and his name had in detestation. Which thing when the Duke heard, he requested the Bishops to pronounce sentence of excommunication vpon all those that by such rymes maliciously did hurt his fame. The Bishop of Bangor therefore (the Aldermen of the Citie assisting him) publicly excommunicated all those that diffamed the Duke, &c.

the Duke excommunicated.

A few dayes after the Duke went vnto the Parliament, that for the causes expressed had been pretermitted: the Duke and noble men being set, they demanded an answer of the knights of the shires, of these things which had bin demanded of them: who answered, that they would to helpe their soueraigne Lord the king grant, not of euery house one penny, but of euery person, man or woman above the age of foureteene yeres one groat throughout England, so that the money should be gathered into the hands of certaine Carles and Barons untill they saw how such a summe should be spent. The cleargie also graunted the like subsidy, for helpe of the king, of euery head, as well religious men as women, as secular priests one groate, if they were not promoted, but of euery religious person promoted twelue pence.

granted.

The duke hauing obtained as he desired, the care of al the heads of the whole realme, was not yet quiet, for the injury done against him by the Londoners: wherefore he caused the king to send for the Mayor, Aldermen and Sherriffes of London, who being brought into the kings chamber of presence, (being then at his manour of Shine) they found the king placed in a chaire, not able well to speake, for the griefe of his sickness, & the Archbishop, with other Bishops, the Duke and the kings sonnes with many Lords & men of honour sitting about him. Where after due reuerence made, and silence commaunded, Sir Robert Aston began an oration, perswading the Citizens to confesse their great and hainous offences against the king, and Duke, & to submit themselves to their mercy. Whereunto the Londoners answered, that they had not conspired against the Duke, neither had there been any shamefull thing spoken or done against him that they did knowe of, or consent vnto, which thing they were ready to pꝛoue before their soueraigne Lord the King, and the Duke himself: Yet not withstanding they affirmed, that they could not stay the folly of the common people, by whom that which had chanced was committed: wherefoze the said Citizens requested the King that he would not punish those that were innocent and ignozant of the fact; but they for reuerence of the King, promised the Duke, that they would indenour themselves to bring in the common people, and to compell them by lawe to make due satisfaction; and moze (said they) we are not able to doe for the Duke, that may be to his honoꝝ. And at this woꝝd, with the Kings will, they were dismissed, full merry when they saluted the Court with their backs.

A procession of the Citizens of London.

After this the King sent vnto them, secretly commaunding them to call all the Citizens together, and to make one ware Candle or Taper with the armes of the Duke his sonne, in the same Taper, and carry the same in a solemne procession to Saint Pauls Church, there continually to burne before the Image of our Lady, continued at the charges of the citie. The ware Taper therfoze being made, the Citizens by voyce of the crier, are generally called together, at which call, they come to heare the cause of their calling, but the communaltie and those of the pꝛoꝝer sozte contemned to be present at such a procession, and therfoze with indignation euery one departed home to his house, only the worshipful and best sozte of the Citizens make the procession, placing the Taper of ware where they were commaunded. But the Duke not contented with this satisfaction, he threatened the Citizens, and said, that that which they had done was nothing gratefull vnto him, nay said he, it rather redoundeth to my great shame, chiefly, for that while he was aliae and well in health, they had in such sozte offered his armes wrought in a ware Taper.

On the other side, the Citizens affirmed that they had expressly done that which his father had commanded them, and would haue done any thing that might haue pleased him. To whome the Duke answered, that they knewe his minde, and were not ignozant howe to make satisfaction: with which woꝝdes the Citizens were much troubled, for (quoth they) amongst themselves, he would haue vs to proclaim him King: but this shall neuer be done, and so they departed, woꝝse friends the they were before. And the Duke ceased not till he had put downe Adam Staple Mayor, in whose place Nicholas Brembar was elected, and on the nine and twentieth of March toke his oth at the Tower of London. Also the Aldermen were deposed and other set in their places.

Sir John Minstarworth Knight who had trayterously forsaken the English armie, at that time when Sir Robert Knowles was sent to inuade Fraunce, was drawne, hanged and quartered on the 12. of Aprill, his head was set on London bridge, and his foure quarters were sent to foure principall cities of England.

In the meane tyme William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, seeing the lawes of the land to be handled, not according to iustice, but as it pleased certain persons, and being destitute of all mens helpe, he turned himselfe to woꝝmankind, makinge, prouiding not onely for himselfe, but also for the oppreſſion and losses of his Church. Therfore, knowing that Alice Piers could do all things that she would, and there was not any man y<sup>e</sup> would in any thing resist her will, he requested her helpe, he offered her money, he promised her great frendship, if she could helpe his Bishopricke forth of such troubles: she promised easly to dispatch his cause, and not refusing that which was offered, went to trie if any sparke of loue yet remained in the King. He therefore that long had been taken with her loue, entiled with her speech, supposed nothing to be denied her now that she asked: against the Dukes will, he commanded his temporallities to beginen vnto him againe, and so the Bishop by right and wrong, recovered that which was lost.

The leuententh of Aprill died the Lady Mary of Saint Paul, Countesse of Penbroke, a woman of singuler example, for liuing to the honoz of God, and glozy of her houle, in relieving poore mens necessities, she spent her goods, that to the Dukes and Princes she shewed examples of good workes: and dying, she gaue all her substance, either to her seruants, or to diuers Churches, but especially to poore people: she founded Penbroke Hall in Cambridge, and named it Aula Maria de Valence in Anno. 1343.

About the same time the Earle of Salisburie, and Sir Richard Anglisson a Doyton, the Bishop of Saint Davids, the Bishop of Hereford, Geoffrey Chaucer, (the famous Poet of England,) and other, were sent into France to treat a peace, or at the least a truce for two yere or moze, but they could not obtaine any longer truce, then for one moneth, which they utterly refused. Whereupon they stayed in France about these things, and some thinking they might safely haue passed betwixt Calais and Dover, about fiftie taking ship, were forthwith intercepted by the Galleyes, and were all slaine, two men and two women onely excepted, even in the very sight of the Townesmen of Calais, they being not able to giue them any ayde: Sir Hugh Calueley being at that present time Captaine of Calais, toke this so great an iniurie in very euill part, especially for that it was done, whilest they were yet treating of peace, but he could not helpe it, wherefore forthwith he toke with him a number of the best and chosen out men, and purposing to requite this iniurie, made a roade into France, killing a great number of men, and brought backe with him a great hostie of artillery and cattell, the messengers returned into England, and brought nothing backe with them, but ruine and warre.

King Edward sodden (as it were) with the disease of the Annuli (which time was giuen him of God to the use of penitence) had almost sodainely died, neglecting the benefite of time that God had giuen him, like as he should neuer haue died: trusting the fond fables of the ofte named Alice, when she affirmed, he should recover his health, so that at that time he talked rather of hauking and hunting, then of any thing that pertained to the sauing of his soule, onely he granted pardon of death for offences, throughout his kingdome to the inhabitants. Being now sodainely taken with the day of his death, he began to haue manifest signes thereof: what Alice Pierce they did, any man may iudge, although we set them not downe in writing, for as soon as the same the King had set foote within deaths doore, she bethought her of sight, yet before she went, that all men might perceiue that she loued not the King for himselfe, but for that which was his, she tooke the ringes from his fingers, which for the royaltie of his Daies he was wont to weare. Thus yelding him such thanks for his fences, she bade him adieu, and so withdore her selfe from him.

Death of king
third.

The King being thus at the point of death, was left not onely of her the said Alice Piers, but of other the Knights and Esquires, who had serued him, allured more with his gifts then his love. Amongst a thousand there was onely present at that time a certaine Priest, (other of his folkes applying the spoile of what they could lay hands on) who lamenting the Kings misery, and inwardly touched with griefe of heart, for that amongst so many Counsellors which he had, there was none that would minister to him the word of life, came boldly vnto him, and admonished him to lift vp the eyes, as well of his body as of his heart vnto God, and with sighes to aske mercy of him, whose maiestie he well knew he had grienously offended, whereupon the King listening to the words of the priest, although he had a little before wanted the vse of his tongue, yet then taking strength to him, seemed to speake what was in his mind, and then what for weaknesse of his body, contrition of his heart, and sobbing for his sins, his voyce and speech fayled him, and scarce halfe pronouncing this word Iesu, he with this last word made an ende of his speech, and yelded vp the Ghost at his Mannor of Shene, (now Richmound) on the 21. day of Iune, in the yere of our Lord 1377. and the 65. yere of his age, when he had reigned 50. yeres, 4. moneths and odder dayes, whose body was afterwards sollemnely buried at Westminster.

This King surpassed al his predecessours, through vertue graunted to him from aboue, in a certaine excellency of magnanimity of heart, for he neuer feared any thing, or changed countenance for any misfortunate channes when they happened, a noble warrior, and fortunate, for as well by land as by sea, in warlike conflicts he obtained the victorie, gentle, familiar, & courteous as well toward strangers, as his owne countrey men and subiects, deuoute in Gods seruice, for he had the Church and ministers thereof in great reuerence. In woildly cares tractable, prouident in counsell, and discret, in sweetnesse of language affable and meke, in gesture and manners wel ordered and ripe, hauing compassio of the afflicted: in bestowing of benefites very liberal, in abundance of wealth modest enough, in erecting of buildings marvellous curious, bearing losses patiently, giue much to hauking & hunting, to the which, whilest he had time, as the season of the yere gaue, he applied himselfe greatly, he was liberall in gifts, and prodigall in expences, proper of person, in stature neither such as excelled the meane bignes of men, nor yet of the lowest sort, hauing a countenance more reuerent, then was commonly in men, but rather like an Angel, in which did shine such a marvellous grace, that such as dyed of him, hoped the day following for good lucke, he gouerned his kingdome euert til his old yeres valiantly, wisely, and royally. But yet he did not refraine riotous luff.

lust, carnall concupiscence, nor motions, of the flesh, euen in his extreme age, and so (as was thought) so; his intemperancie ended his life the sooner.

He had issue by the Lady Philip his wife, seuen sonnes, Edward the blacke Prince, William of Hatfield that died yong, Leonel Duke of Clarence, Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Edmond of Langley Earle of Cambridge, and Duke of Poike, William of Windsor; y died without issue, Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, and Duke of Gloucester: and fine daughters, Isabel married to the Lord Coucy, Earle of Bedford, Ioane Quene of Spaine, Blanch that died yong, Mary married to Iohn Mountfort Duke of Bytaine, and Margaret Countesse of Denbroke. He founded Cassminster, commonly called new abbey nere vnto the tower of London, wherein he placed white monks of the order Cisteraux, to the honour of God, and our Lady of grace, according to a vow by him made, being on the seas in great perill, by meanes of a tempest: he founded an abbey for Nunnes at Dertford in Kent, he founded the kings hall in Cambridge for poore schollers, (which hall with others was suppressed by H. Henry the 8. for the foundation of Trinitie Colledge there) he also founded an Hospitall for the poore, and named it Maison de Dieu, or Gods house, in the town of Caleis, he reedified or newly builded S. Steuens Chappell at Westminster, altering the same into a colledge of a Deane, 12. secular Chanons, 12. Vicars, and other ministers & seruants, and indued it with revenues to the value of 500. ponde by yere. He also reedified or almost newly builded the Castle of Windsor. He also augmenting the Chappell there, which his progenitors kings of Englad, had before erected of 8. Chanons, he added to them a Deane and 15. Chanons, 24. poore & impotent knights and other ministers. Quene Mary was the first that brought water to that castle by Conduite, which before was watered by wellles. It remaineth of record which I haue seene, that tithe hath been paid at Windsor for wine pressed out of grapes, that were wonted to grow in the little parke there.

Richard of Burdeaux.

Richard the 2. bozne at Burdeaux, the sonne of Prince Edward, being but eleuen yeres old, began his reigne the 21. day of June, in the yere of our Lord God 1377. In beauty, bounty, and liberality, he far passed all his progenitors, but was ouermuch giuen to rest and quietnes, louing litle deedes of armes, and for that he was yong, was most ruled by yong counsell, and regarded nothing the counsels of the sage and wise men of the Realme, which thing turned this land to great trouble, and himselfe to extreme miserie, as is by these verses declared. When this King first began to raaigne, the Lawes neglected were, Wherefore good fortune him forlooke, and th'earth did quake for feare, The people also whom he polde, against him did rebell. The time doth yet bewaile the woes, that Chronicles doe tell,

Vox clamantis, Ioh Gower.

The foolish counsell of the lewde, and yong he did receiue,
 And graue aduice of aged heads, he did reiect and leaue.
 And then for greedy thurt of Coyne, some subiects he accused,
 To gaine their goods into his hands, thus he the realme abused.

On the foresaid 21. of Iune, before the old King was departed, the Londoners hauing certaine knowledge, y he could not liue any season, sent the chiefest and most worthy citizens of their cittle, vnto Kensington, where the pynce and his mother remained, to declare vnto the said pynce their ready minds, & good will to accept him for their true and lawfull King and Gouvernour, Iohn Philpot being especially appointed to do the message, began his Oracion thus.

John Philpot
 his Oracion to the Prince.

We bring newes, most excellent Prince (which without great sorrows we cannot rehearse) of the vndoubted death of our most inuincible King Edward your Grandfather, who hath kept and gouerned vs, and this kingdome (as I may say) a longtime in quiet peace; and now by the manifest tokens of death in him, he hath ceased to be our Gouvernour: wherefore we beseech you, on the behalfe of the Citizens, and City of London, that you will haue recommended to your good grace, the City your chamber, whom we knowledgely shortly to be our King, to whose rule we onely submit our selues, and bow to your will and pleasure vnder your dominion to serue in word and dede. And that we recite further our message, your reuerence knoweth, your City to be vnspeakably troubled, for that you haue withdrawne your presence from it, which is knowen to be so much at your deuotion, that the Citizens are not onely ready to spend their goods for your sake, but also to leopord their liues. Wherefore we come to your presence, to beseech you that it may please you to remaine there, both to the comfort of vs your citizens, and also to the surety and solace of your selfe. We further beseech you most noble Prince, that you would vouchsafe to make some good and profitable end of the discorde, which lately hath risen throught the malice of some, and not to the commoditie of any, but to the hindzance and discommoditie of many, betwixt our Citizens, and the Duke of Lancaster. To these and other like words vttered by the said Iohn Philpot, it was answered by the Prince, and his counsell, that he would doe his endeavour to satisfie their desire in all things, and so being sent away, they returned bringing glad tidings to their fellow Citizens.

The next morrow there was sent to London, on the Kings behalfe, the Lord Latimer, Sir Nicholas Bond, Sir Simon Burley, & Sir Richard Adderbery, which in name of the new King saluted the citizens with their message of the new King to wardnes, who promised to loue them and their city, & to come to them as they had requested: they also told y citizens, how the King had spoken to the duke for them, and how the Duke in all things had submitted himselfe to the Kings will, that they also should submit themselves in the same maner; and then the King would endeavour himselfe that peace should concluded, to the honor and commoditie of the citizens: but the citizens fearing such forme of peace as might happen, answered, that they would not in any wise so doe, especially because they knew the King to be but yong, and weake to helpe them in such a troublesome businesse, & that their cause should not be discussed by him, but by

by their deadly enemies, & so they should be punished at their pleasure, if they consented to the kings request in that article. At length after talke had vpon this businesse, fire houres together or moze, they light vpon this point, that if the said knights would be bound to the citizens, that their submission should not redound to the tempoꝛall losse, or bodily harine of any Citizen, or prejudice of their Citie, they would gladly obey the kings commaundement. The knights desirous to satissie the kings desire, and to pꝛouide for the quietnes of the Citizens, vnderooke by othe of fidelitie, and their knighthood, that it should not be to their prejudice, but to their commoditie, if they would submit themselues. This surety receiued, the Citizens toke their iourney towards Shire, where they found the new king with his mother, the Duke and the Dukes brethren; there were also many Bishops gathered about the dead bodie of the late king: The coming of the Citizens being knowen to the king, hee straight commaunded them to be called before him, the which Citizens as before besought him to reforme the peace betwixt the Duke and them, affirming that they were readie in all things to submit themselues vnto his will and pleasure, not as though they confessed they had made any fault against the Duke, but as men that came at this time for the benefit of peace, and honour, aswel to the king, as the duke, to pacifie the hearts, and mitigate the displeasure of both.

The Duke seeing them in this manner to haue submitted themselues to the king, though (as it was said) he had other matters in his head, yet fearing that hee should not after ward come to so honoꝛable conditions, if he refused this forme of peace, fell down at the kings feet, and beseeched him to take the cause in hand vnder the forme that the Londoners had exprest, desiring therewith that they which had been imprisoned for any dishonour offered him, might be with the kings fauour released and set at libertie: And so he did forgive the Citizens whatsoever they had committed against him, and receiued them into his full fauour, in the presence of the king, affirming with an oth that he would be their friend, and as carefull for their commodities as for his owne, and in token of an vnfained peace, he kissed every one of them before the king, and so with quietnes, the Citizens returned home praising God, that had brought the Duke to such humilitie, who a litte before had demaunded in great pride, of the Citizens for his fauour, one hundred hogdheads of wine, & an infinite number of precious stones. The Friday next following the Duke and Citizens came to Westminster, where was proclaimed the union and agreement betwene them.

The yong king desirous at his entring to the kingdome to haue an vnitie amongst his subjects in every place, brought the Duke and the Bishoppe of Winchester to be at one, and wheresocuer in his Realme he knew any discord and variance to be risen, he toke the quarels into his hands, promising to make a good and fruitfull end for both parties. He also deliuered Peter de la More, (a knight of Herefordshire) out of the Castell of Nottingham, where he had bene long imprisoned, and by his letters patents released him of all things whatsoever, in the name of the king might be laid vnto him.

The Duke of Lancaster and the Citizens of London made friends.

towne of Rye
and burne it.

Upon the feast day of Saint Peter and Paule the Apostles in the mornynge, the Frenchmen with fine vessels, great and small, invaded the towne of Rye, and with small labour toke the towne, albeit the towne dwellers upon confidence of strength, had taken order that none should remove their goods from the towne, that at the least wise, for love of their goods, they might with more courage abide the conflicts: yet notwithstanding they turne their backs in the time of battell, whereupon it came to passe, that by their want of heart and courage, the towne was taken with all their goods.

with fire.

The Abbot of Battayle hearing of so lamentable a report, put his men in armour to defend the villages nigh adioynning, & one of the enemies going forth for forage, being taken by one of the Abbots men, declared that the French men purposed to keepe the said towne for ten daies, wherupon the Abbot removed with his power to the towne of Winchelsey, which towne (as the prisoner reported) the French purposed to assault, but when they saw the Abbot and his men armed in that towne, dispaying of further entrance into that Countrey, they begin to set fire on the towne of Rye, and within five houres brought it wholly unto ashes, with the Church that then was there of a wonderfull beautie, conveying away foure of the richest of that towne prisoners, and slaying 66. left not above eight in the towne: 42. hogsheads of wine they caried from thence to their Ships, with the rest of their bottle, and left the towne desolate.

King Richard
crowned.
Charles created Knights made

King Richard was crowned with great solemnity at Westminster by the hands of Simon Sudbury Archbishop of Canterbury, on the 16. day of July. At this coronation Li. Richard created foure new Barons, Thomas of Woodstocke, Li. Edwards yongest sonne Earle of Buckingham and Northampton, to whom he gave 1000. markes yearly out of his treasury, till he had provided him land to that value. Thomas Mowbray of Aylmer, earle of Northampton, Guisard or Gifford Angoulême knight of Gascoigne, and master to the king, Earle of Huntingdon, to whom he likewise gave 1000. markes yearly out of his treasury, till he had provided him lands to that value: And Henry Percy, Earle of Northumberland. He also made nine knights, to wit, Edward sonne to Edmond Earle of Kent, John sonne to Thomas Roos of Hamelake, Robert de Gray of Kotherfield, Richard sonne to Gilbert Talbot, Gerard sonne to Warine de Lisle, Michaell sonne to Michaell de la Pole, Richard de Poynings, Robert de Harrington, and Thomas de la More.

to Michael.

Sir John Burleigh knight, the kings Chamberlaine, Custos of Potttingham castle, was also for terme of life by patent, made keeper of the forrest of Sherwood. And Simon Burleigh knight his brother, was made Constable of Winclesore castle, Wigmore, Guilford, and the Manor of Kennington, and also master of the kings falcons at his Dues, nere Charing-crosse by Westminster, this sir Simon Burleigh had his house in London in Thamesstrate betwixt Barnards castle & Pauls wharfe, which house sometime belonged to the abbey of Fylcamp, & by reason of the wars in France came to the kings hands.

About the same time, Henry Percy marshall of England, and Earle of Northumberland, resigned the rodde of his office, and went home to his countrey, in whose place Iohn of Arundale, brother to the Earle of Arundale was sent, who valiantly resisted the Frenchmen, when they assailed the towne of South-hampton, and manfully kept them off from entring the towne, being chased to the sea.

About the same time, of a small cause discord rose in the sayre of Rockesborough, betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, and certaine on both sides being slaine, the Scots were put to the worse. Whereupon being turned into a fury, shortly returning to the town with the Earle of Dunbarre, they entred in the night, slue the townsmen, spoiled their goods, & committed the town to the fire: which thing being known, the new Earle of Northumberland sozowing inwardly euil at the heart for the death of the same townsmen, determined to reuenge their death vpon the enemies, & entring into Scotland with 10000 men, he tooke prizes in the land of the Earle of Dunbarre, for the space of thre daies togither, burning vp al that came in his way, & returned with his people.

The one and twentieth of August, the French men tooke the vniwinable (that I may so call it) Ile of Wight, more by craft, then by force, which Ile had not ben taken by any men, if the same had ben wel kept wth diligent watch, but the euer assured security of the Island men, brought on them their destruction, and to the French vn hoped for victory. In deed the Frenchmen being dzinen on the shore by tempest, attempted to enter the Ile, supposing the Island men had not ben aware of their comming: but the purpose of the French was not known to the watchmen, and therefore they suffered them to enter on the land, to the ende, that after so many were come on land, as they supposed they might deale with, the residue should be kept off, but it chanced otherwise then they thought, for as we said, some being entred, when the Wightmen would haue stopped the other, the Frenchmen pressed forward with such force, that they repulsed the Island men from their ground, so that they were dzinen to seeke refuge by hiding themselves.

The French therefore hauing thus gotten the Island, did much hurt in slaying the inhabitants, burning certaine townes, and taking the substance from the people: at length comming to the castle, and thinking to haue wonne it wth final adoe, they finde there a pike of incredible sharpnes, for Sir Hugh Tirell keeper of the said castle, boldly comming to incounter them, made great slaughter among them, by reason wherof they left from assailing that castle, and from thenceforth thinking it not good to dwell so nere a Serpent, they gathered together what spoyle they might of the Ile, and constrained the Islanders to get of their friends without the Ile, a thousand marks of siluer for the sauing of their houses from burning, and for the residue of their goods. Dozeoner, taking of them an oath of fidelitie, not to resist the for the space of one yere, whensoever it should please the to land there, they departed thence to their gallees, and againe coasted the shore about till they came to the town of Winchelsea, where vnderstanding the abbot of Battal was come to defend it, they sent him word to redeme the town, vnto whom the abbot answered, he needed not to redeme the thing that was not lost, but willed the to desist from molesting the towne vpon paine of that which might follow. The French asperated with this answer, requested him that if he would not have peace, he would send forth to fight man to man, or more in number if he would to try the matter in view of armes: but neither would the Abbot admit the one request or the other, saying, he was a religious man, and therefore not to admit such petitions, and that he came not thither to fight, but to defend & preserve the peace of the countrey. These things being heard, the Frenchmen supposing that the Abbot and his people wanted courage, they assaulted the towne with such instruments of warre, as cast forth stones farre off, not ceasing from none til evening, but by the laudable prowes of the Abbot, and such as were with him, the French prevailed nothing, but left it as they founde it.

The towne of Hastings burnt.

In the meane time whilst they were busied thus at Winchelsey, they sent part of their company unto Hastings, where finding the towne almost empty, they burnt it.

Prison of Lewes taken by French.

The same yere the Frenchmen comming by at Ratingdon in Sussex, nere to the towne of Lewes, the Prisoner of Lewes with a small company met them, and was taken by the Frenchmen, that came upon him, and caried to their ships, with two knights, to wit, Sir Iohn Fallesbey, and Sir Thomas Cheyne, and an Esquier called Iohn Brokas, among other a certaine Esquier that had been long in service with the Prisoner of Lewes, a Frenchman by nation, sought so manfully against the Frenchmen, that his bowels falling from him to his sēte, he yet pursued them. There was slain in this battel about one hundred of the Englishmen, and the Frenchmen returned home with all their spoyle, which was 37. Gallies, and 8. Caruels of Spaine, and certaine Barkes: straightwaies therefore as they came to land, some of them went unto the siege, that was about Arde, & by treason which alwaies is familiar to them, the keeper of that castle being an Almaine, to wit, the Lord of Sunney delivered to them the towne, they straight got the castell also, for the which the same keeper being taken by Sir Hugh Calueley keeper of Cales, was sent into England, and committed to prison.

Parliament at London.

The same time a Parliament was assembled at London, which continued from Michaelmas till S. Andrewes tide. In the which Parliament were almost all those knights, with the said Peter de la More, which so nobly had stood forth in the Parliament, which rightly was called the good Parliament, for the increase of their Countrey, and profit of their kingdom. Thus therefore taking in hand againe the petitions in the same place, as they left them, they earnestly stood in the matter, to haue Alice Pierce banished, who contemning the statute of Parliament, and the oath which she had taken, durst take on her to enter the kings court to compell him, and to haue of him what pleased her, who although she had corrupted many of the Lords, and all the lawes with money, the which not onely secretly but openly pleaded for her; yet by the diligence and wisdom of the said knights, she being convicted by her owne mouth, was banished, and her moveable goods confiscate to the kings use: but in the yere next following, to wit, the second yere of king Richard, the said Alice Pierce then wife to William Windsor knight, was pardoned, and in the se-nenty yere of the same king, her goods befoze confiscate by Parliament, were againe restozed and recompenced.

There was granted to the king of the Cleargie two tenths to be paid that yere, with condition, that from hencefozth the king should not extort from his Subiects by such petitions or demaunds but liue of his owne, and continue his warre, soz as it was answered there, his owne goods pertaining to the crowne, sufficed both to the finding of his house, and maintaining of his warres, if the same were bestowed by fit ministers, and soz the keeping of the money, two Citizens of London were appointed, William Walworth, and John Philpot. The Englishmen hearing of a number of Spanish shippes to remaine at Ruce for want of winde, assembling a great companie of armed men, and a great paille, meant to take the seas: their chiefe Captaines were Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, the Duke of Byrtayne, the Lord Latimer, the Lord Robert Fitz Walter, sir Robert Knowles, and many other valiant personages, who being entred the Sea, tasted fortune disfaourable, for by a tempestuous wind that rose, their ships were scattered in sunder, their mastes were broken downe, their sailes rent, and many of the small vessels that were victuallers were downed; at length the ships got together againe, and arriued in England, and being nowe rigged are estimes fraught with men, and to the sea they goe. About the same time, sir Hugh Calueley making a iourney towards Bulloigne, found a barge in the haven of the towne, that bare the name of the towne, and another that was the French kings, & xviii. other vessels moze and lesse, all the which with a great part of the suburbs of Bulloigne, he caused to be dispoled, taking with him what soeuer was there to be desired, with certaine prisoners: hee droue afoze him a great bottie of sheepe and beasts, which he found pasturing nere the towne, which might well serue to victuall Calels for a great thne: he recovered the same day the Castell of Marke, which thzough negligence befoze had been lost. King Richard kept his Christmas at Wandlefoze.

The English flete whercof we spake, returned without any great god successe, they toke an eight Spanish ships in the Britissh coasts nere to Bzest, and moze had taken if their businesse had been so well done, as was pretended: and therefore the flete returned home, so tossed with stormes and contrarie weather, and after with intestine discord, that it seemed there wanted among them Gods fauour. The Lord Percy (this flete remaining for the mending of his ships, whilest the other were abroad) went now to the sea, with a great ship and some smaller vessels, and meeting with fiftie ships laden with French warres and merchandize, of which some were of Flaunders, some of Spayne, he set on them all, who beholding his bold enterprize, and thinking that he had some aide at hand gaue oer to make resistance, and so xviii. escaping by flight, xvii. yelded themselves to the said Thomas Lord Percy. Sir Hugh Calueley with a power secretly armed, went to the towne of Staple, where the sayze was then, to the which were come many Merchantenmen from Bulloigne, Bitterell, Amiens, and Paris, where he falling on them that were unarmed, slew many, toke many to be put to their ransomes, sacked all the goods, and

The men of Winchelsey & Rye, gathered a great number of people together, and imbarked themselves towards Normandy, desirous to requite the losses which before they had receiued, and so in the night arriving in a towne called Peters Hauen, entred the same, slaying so many as they met, and those whom they thinke able to pay ranfome, they carry to their ships: they spoiled the houses with the Churches, where they found many rich spoiles which sometime had ben by the Frenchmen set from Rye, and especially the belles and such like, which they shipped, set the rest on fire, & then they land at Willel, not farre from thence, where they practised the like cheuance, and so with their rich spoyle returned home.

About the same time Iohn duke of Lancaster requested that the money granted to the king by the cleargy and laity, might be committed to his custody, affirming that he would keepe the enemies off from the coastes of England, by the space of one yere with that money, and moreover bzing to passe some further great commodity, to whose impoztunate petition the Lords although against their willes agreed. They appoint therfore the first day of March to meet in counsell, in which euery of those should goe forth on this iourney: and least the sea should in the meane time want those that should keepe it, there were nine ships hired of them of Balon, to defend the sea and land from incursions of the French and others. These ships being furnished with sufficient numbers of armed men, within a short time coasting the seas, met the Spauy and merchandise of the Spanyards, and entring battell with them, in short time took foureteen of their ships laden with wines and other merchandise, and returned into England ioyfully: vnto sir Robert Knowles Captaine of Bresset, they gaue the first fruits of their pray, 100. tunne of their best wines as they passed by him homewards.

Ro. Knowles.

In the meane time Henry the bastard, calling himselfe king of Spaine, hearing that they of Bayon had done such harme vnto his people, and that the D. of Lancaster had prepared a great number to enter the sea, he was soze afraid, thinking that hee minded not onely to defend the Sea, but rather to saeke his kingdome, which by right of his wife the lawful inheritor of Spaine, he meant to challenge: wherefore the said Henry commaunded a Spauy to be prepared of all his land that he might stay the said Duke from entering his countrey, and if he might, to take him prisoner, which happily they had done, if the king of Portugale with almost an innumerable number had not entred the kingdome of Spaine, the selfe same time that the bastard Henry prepared himselfe against the Duke, deferring his iourney from day to day: they that were appointed Captaines ouer the Spauie with certaine men of warre, got them to the sea, there to stay for the Dukes comming, esteeming it more glorious to liue on the sea by prayes, taking from the enemies, then to liue by spoyle of their owne countreymen at home.

When

When they had certaine daies wasted by and down the seas, the Spaniards met them with an armed company, so that eyther part in hope of pray toynd together in fight, but our men hauing the wind and weathier contrary to them, lost the victorie to their enemies, some escaping by flight, & some being taken, amongst the which sir Hugh Courney a noble knight was one.

About the same time Iohn Mercer a Scot, gathering together no small number of Frenchmen, Scots and Spaniards, set vpon certaine ships of Scarbozow, toke them and led them into Scotland, this he did in reuenge of his fathers iniury, who was before taken by the Englishmen, and kept prisoner in the castle of Scarbozow.

Iohn Philpot
of London.
Ann. reg. 2.

Iohn Philpot a Citizen of London, a man of folly witt, and very rich in substance, considering the want of the Duke of Lancaster & other Lordes that ought to haue defended the realme, & lamenting the oppressions of the inhabitants, hired with his own money, to the number of a thousand souldiers, the which might take from the said Iohn Mercer both his ships and goods, which he had by rouing taken, and defend the realme of England from such incurfions: and it came to passe within a small time, that his hired men toke the said Iohn Mercer with all his ships, which he had violently taken from Scarbozow and fiftene Spanissh ships that were laden with much riches, and were with him in ayde at that present. There was great ioy made among the people, all men praising that worthy mans bountifullnes & loue towards the king. The Earle & Barons seeing so laudable an act, atchieued by Iohn Philpot, toke it grieuously, although they knew themselves guilty: first they secretly lie in wait, to do him some displeasure, and after they spake against him openly, saying, it was not lawfull for him to do such things without the counsell of the king and realme; certaine of the Lords, but the chiefe being Hugh Earle of Stafford, that rehearsed these things thus against him, were answered by the same Iohn Philpot: Sir, know (saith hee) that I neither sent my money nor men to the danger of the seas, that I should take from you, or your fellows, the good renoume of Chivalry, and winne it to me, but being sorrowfull to see the peoples misery, in my countrey, which now through your thoughtfulness, of the most noble Lady of pations, is brought to lie open to the spoyling of euery vilest pation, when there is not one of you that doth put his hand to the defence therof. I haue therfore set forth my selfe and mine, for the sauing of my pation and Countrey: the Earle had not to answer.

The eleuenth day of August, certaine wicked persons of the kings house being armed, at high passe time entred the Church of Westminster Abbey, and there set vpon two balliant Esquiers, Iohn Schakell and Robert Hawley, which had escaped out of the Tower of London, to the said Abbey, for refuge of Sanctuarie: they slew the said Robert Hawley in the quire before the Priors stall, and slew a Monke which intreated them to spare the saide Robert in that place. Sir Ralph Ferris, and sir Alan Buxule, Captayne of the Tower (some say the Lord Latimer) were the Captaines of this mischief.

About this time saith Polidor, the making of Gunnes was found, by a certaine Almaine, who hauing the powder of Byrnstone in a Morter which he had beaten for a medicine, and covered with a stone, as he strooke fire, a sparke chanced to fall into the powder, whereby a flame out of the morter raised the stone a great height, which after he had perceiued, he made a pipe of yron, and tempered the powder with other, and so finished that deadly engine, as reporteth Blondus and R. The same time John Wickliffe parson of Lutterworth in Leterker-shire, laboured in his preaching to proue that after the consecration in the masse made by the Priest, very bread and wine were there present as before, Christ being there assistant, as in euery place, but moze specially, & the same bread not to be moze worth then other bread, except onely for the blessing of the Priest, and therefore he affirmed that Christians were deceived in honouring of the said bread, which was a thing without life, for any thing that had life, was better then that which lacked life.

to aid the king of Portugall.

A great army was assembled and sent to the aid of the Duke of Lancaster, against the king of Spayne, for the said Duke affirmed, that it was expedient for this realme, that an host of men, with abundance of money should be sent to the king of Portugale, that he might thereby be bound to aide the king of England, and stop the passage of the straites of Gibaltare, or of Mozoc, from the Gallies, that must of necessitie passe by the same straites, to come to infect the British, or English Ocean, so that should England be safe, and Fraunce should be deceived: Captaines appointed to this army, were Edmond of Langley, Earle of Cambridge, William Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Botetax, sir Matthew Gourney, and many other knights, the which passed the seas, and prosperously came to Lyfbone, and were thankfully receiued of the king, but these were not able to assaile the king of Spayne, yet greatly profitting Portugale, they defended the confines, and stayed the Spaniards that they could not enter the countrey as enemies: our men oft times inuaded the Spaniards, and boldly abode in that land untill a greater number of warriors might be sent vnto them out of England.

A great rebellion in England, and the causes thereof.

In this meane time, the realme of England, appointed to be punished for her sinnes, was sodainly plagued in such sort, that if God had not sooner suppressed the same, both the gouernment had bene utterly destroyed, and the whole realme made a laughing stocke and scozne to all nations.

In the last yere (as is aforesaid) was granted to the king a grieuous tare or tallage of his subiects, both spiritual and tempozall, thzough the which was raised in England, a shipwracke of great troubles: for diuers Courtiers desirous to enrich themselves with other mens goods, informed the king & his court, that the tallage was not gathered bp faithfully to the kings vse by the Collectors: whereupon they offered to the king, that they would pay a great summe of money for the same of that which they would gather ouer and besides that which had bene paid, if they might be by the king thereunto authorized. And some of them getting the kings letters and authority, safe in diuers places of Kent and Essex, and handled the people very sore and vncourteously almost not to be spoken, for the leuping of the said summe of money, which, some of the people taking in euill part, they secretly toke counsell together, gathered assistants, and resisted the exactors, rising against them, of whom some they slew, some they wounded, and the rest fled.

The king therefore ordained certaine Commissioners to enquire, howe they were leuied, amongst the which, one was sent into Essex to Thomas de Bampton, hee sitting one day before Whitson-tide, at Bzentwood, enquiring how the Collectors had leuied the subsidy before said, all the people of fobbing answered, they would not pay one peny more then they had done, whereof they had his acquittance, wherupon the said T. did grievously threaten them, hauing with him two Sergeants at Armes of the kings, wherupon they of fobbing, of Curringham, and of Samford, assembled to the number of more then one hundred, went to T. Bampton and gaue him flat answer that they would neither treat with him, or pay any such money as was demanded: wherefore the said Bampton commaunded the Sergeants to arrest and put them in prison, but the townsmen made them all to fly towards London to the kings counsell. Wherupon sir Robert Belknap chiefe Justice of the common Pleas was sent downe with commission of Traylbaston, and before him sundry inditements of those men; who comming before him called him traitor to the king, and realme, and furthermore compelled him to sweare vpon a booke, that he should no more sit in any such Sessions, and to declare to the names of the Jurors, whose heads they chopped off as they found them, and destroyed their houses, which made sir Robert Belknap in haste to fly his house. This done the Commons assembled before Whitson-tide to a great number: those toke all the Clerkes of the said T. Bampton and chopped off their heads, which they caried before them on poles. At the same time the great Pryor of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem by London, hauing a godly and delectable Manor in Essex, wherein was ordained victuals and other necessities, for the vse of a Chapter Generall, and great aboundance of sayre stuffe, of Wines, Arras clothes, and other prouision for the knightes brethren: The Commons entred this Manor, eate vp the victuals and prouision of Wine, three tunne, and spoiled the Manor and the ground with great damage: then they sent diuers letters into Kent, Suffolk, and Northfolke to rise with them, and departing themselves into diuers companies, committed many outrages: shortly after, to wit, on Monday after Whitson-day, a knight of the kings house, named sir Simon Burley, hauing in his companie two Sergeants at Armes of the kings, came to Grauesend, where he challenged one to be his bondman, for whom, men of the towne did gently intreat him to shew fauour, but sir Simon would not take lesse then 300. pound of siluer for his manumission, & therefore arrested him, and sent him to Rochester Castell, wherupon the Commons of Kent began to rise, for the which the king sent a Justice of Traylbaston, with Iohn Legge a Serieaunt of Armes, there to sit, hauing with them many inditements, but as they would haue late at Canterbury vpon their commissio, they were resisted by the commons, who daily grew to a great multitude, & being without a captain, came to Dartford, where they toke counsaile, and appoynted that none which were dwelling within twelve miles of the ſea, ſhould goe with them, but keepe the coaſt of the ſea from enemies, ſaying there were more kings then one, which they would not ſuffer, nor haue any other but king Richard. On the Friday after, they came to Rocheſter, and there ſoynd with the Eſſer rebels, who together ſtrongly beſieged the Caſtle, and deliuered the man of Graueſend with other: then they made Wat Tighler of Maidſtone their Captaine, who with his company on Monday after Trinity Sunday, came to Canterbury, where they commaunded the Monkes to chuſe them an Archbiſhop, for he that now is, (quoth they) is a traitor, & ſhal be beheaded. When they ſwoze the Maior, Baliffes, and Commons of the Towne to be true to king Richard and the lawfull Commons of England. They beheaded thre men of that town, and then taking with them 500. men of that town toward London, left the reſt to keepe the ſaid town. This tumult thus begun in Kent, by meane of ſir Simon Burley, was alſo increaſed by diuers other actions in other places, amongſt the which, as I finde noted in a Chronicle ſometimes belonging to the Monastery of Saint Albons one of the collectors of the grotes, or polle money, comming to the houſe of one Iohn Tylar, in the town of Dartford in Kent, demanded of the Tylars wiſe, for her husband, her ſelfe, her ſeruants, and ſo; their daughter (a yung mayden) euery one of them a grote; which the Tylars wiſe denied not to pay, ſauing for her daughter, whom ſhe ſaid was but a child, not to be counted a woman: quoth the collector, that will I ſome wiſe, and taking the mayden, and turned her by to ſearch whether ſhe were vnder growne with haire or not, (for in many places they made the like triall) whereupon her mother cried out, neighbours came running in: and her husband being at worke in the ſame town, tyling of an houſe, when he heard thereof, caught his lathing ſtaffe in his hand, and ranne reaking home, where reaſoning with the Collector, who made him ſo bold, the Collector answered with ſtout wordes, and ſtrake at the Tylar, whereupon the Tylar auoiding the blow, ſmote the Collector with his lathing ſtaffe, that the braines flew out of his head, wherethrough great noyſe aroſe in the ſtreets, and the poore people being glad, euery one prepared to ſupport the ſaid Iohn Tylar. Thus the Commons being drawne together, went to Maidſtone, and from thence backe againe to Blacke heath, and ſo in ſhort time they ſtirred all the Countrey, in a manner to the like commotion, and ſo forthwith beſetting the waies that lead to Canterbury, arreſt all paſſengers, compelling them to ſwear: firſt, that they ſhould keepe their allegiance vnto king Richard, and to the Commons, and that they ſhould accept no king that was named Iohn, for enuy they bare vnto Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, who named himſelfe king of Caſtile, and that they ſhould be ready when ſo euer they were called, and that they ſhould agree to no Ware to be leued from thenceforth in the kingdome, nor conſent to any except it were a fiſtene.

The ſame of theſe doings ſpread into Suſſer, Hertſorde, Eſſer, and Cambridgſhire, Dorſolke, Suffolke, &c. and when ſuch aſſembling of the common people daily toke increaſe, and that their number was now made made almost infinite, so that they feared no man to resist them, they beganne to shewe some such Actes as they had considered in their mindes, and tooke in hande to behead all men of Lawe, as well Apprentices, as Titter-bartiffers and old Justices, with all the Jurers of the countrey, whom they might get into their hands, they spared none whom they thought to be learned, especially if they found any to haue pen and inke, they pulled off his hode, and all with one voice of crying, Hale him out, and cut off his head.

They also determined to burne all Court rolles and olde monuments that the memory of antiquities being taken away, their Lordes should not be able to chalenge any right on them, from that time forth. These Commons had to their Chapleine or Preacher a wicked Priest, called Sir Iohn Ball, who counsailed them to destroy all the Nobility, and Cleargy, so that there should bee no Bishop in England, but one Archbischoppe, which should be himselfe, and that there should not bee aboue two religious persons in one house, and their possessions should bee deuided among the laye men, for the which doctrine they held him as a prophet. They going to wardes London met diuers Lawyers, and twelue Knights of that countrey, whom they forced to sweare to maintaine them, or else to be beheaded: this being knowne to the King, on Wednesday following hee sent messengers to demanda the cause of their rising. Who answered, that they were gathered together for his safety, to destroy those that were traitors to him and his kingdome: the king by messengers replied, that they should cease their assemblies untill hee mought speake with them, and all matters should be amended. Whereupon the Commons requested the King to come and see them on the Blacke heath, and the King the third time sent word that hee would willingly come to them the next day. At what time the King being at Windsor remoued in all haste to London, whom the Mayor met, and safely brought to the Tower, whither the Archbischoppe of Canterburie Chancelor, the Bischoppe of London, the Pryor of Saint Iohn Treasurer, the Earles of Buckingham, Kent, Arundale, Warwick, Suffolke, Orford, and Salisbury, and other of the Nobility, and Gentlemen to the number of fife hundred did come, and on Corpus Christi eue the Commons of Kent came to blacke heath, thre miles from London, to meete with the King, hauing displayed before them two Banners of Saint George, and therscore Penons. The Commons of Essex came on the other parte of the riuer Thames, to haue also aunswere from the king, at what time the king being in the Tower, commaunded barges to be made ready, and taking with him his Counsell, and foure barges for his retinue, was rowed to Greenwich, where the Chancelor, and Treasurer perswaded the King that it were great follie to goe to a number of men without reason, and thereupon hee staide. The Commons therefoze sent to him, requiring to haue the heades of Iohn Duke of Lancaster, and fiftene other Lordes, whereof fourtene were present with him in the Tower, to wit, Simon Sudburie Chancelor, Sir Robert Hales Treas-

surer, the Bishoppe of London, Iohn Fordham Clarke of the pynale Seale, Robert Belknap chiefe Justice, sir Ralph Ferers, sir Robert Plessington chiefe Baron of the Erchequer, Iohn Legge Sergeant at armes, Thomas Bampton and others, wherunto the king would not assent, but willed them to come to him to Windsor, on Monday next, where they should haue sufficient answer to all their demands. The Commons had a watch-word, which was this: With whom holde you: and the answer was, with king Richard, and the true Commons, and who could not that watch-word, off went his head. The king being warned that if he came to the Commons, hee should becaried about by them, & forced to grant them their requests whatsoever, hee returned toward London and entred the Tower, about thre of the clock: The Commons being certified that the king was gone, they on the same day toward euening came to Southwarke, where they brake downe the houses of the Marshalsey, and loosed the prisoners, amongst other they brake downe the house of Iohn Inworth then Marshal of the Marshalsey, the kings Bench, & all the houses of Jurers, & Questmongers, continuing that outrage all the night: At what time the Commons of Essex went to Lambeth a Panno: of the Archbishop of Canterbury, entred the house, spoiled and burnt all the goods with the books, registers, and remembrances of the Chancery. The next day being Thursday, and the feast of Corpus Christi, or the 13. of June; the Commons of Essex in the morning went to the Panno: of Highbery two miles from London north, this Panno: belonging to the Pprio: of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, they wholly consumed with fire. On which day also in the morning the Commons of Kent brake downe the few-houses nere London brydge, at that time in the hands of the frowes of Flaunders, who had farmed them of the Pprio: of London. After which they went to London brydge, in hope to haue entred the Citie: but the Pprio: comming thither before, fortified the place, caused the brydge to be drawn vp, and fastened a great chaine of yron a crosse, to restrain their entrie. When the Commons of Surrey, who were risen with the other, cried to the wardens of the brydge to let it downe, whereby they might passe, or else they would destroy them all, whereby they were constrained for feare to let it downe, & giue them entrie, at which time the religious persons were earnest in procession, and prayer for peace: the Commons passed through the Citie, and did no hurt, they take nothing from any man, but bought all things at a iust price: and if they found any man with theft, they beheaded him. Now talking with the simple Commons, of procuring them liberty, and apprehending traitors (as they termed them) especially the Duke of Lancaster, they shortly got all the poore Citizens to conspire with them: and the same day, after the sunne was got on some height that it wared warme, and that they had tasted at their pleasures of diuers wines, whereby they were become as madde, as drunken (for the rich Citizens had let open their sellers to enter at their pleasure) they began to talke of many things, amongst the which they exhorted each other, that going to the Sauoy, the Duke of Lancasters house, to the which there was none in the Realme

Realme to be compared in beauty and stateliness, they mought set fire on it, and burne it; this talke pleasing the Commons of the Citie, they straight ranne thither, and setting fire on it round about applied their trauaile, to destroy that place: and that it mought appeare to the communalty of the realme, that they did not any thing for couetise, they caused Proclamation to be made, that none on paine to lose his head, should presume to conuert to his owne vse any thing that there was, or mought bee found, but that they should breake such plate and vessel of gold and siluer, as were in that house in great plenty, into small peeces, and throw the same into the Thames, or into some priuies; clothes of gold, siluer, silke, & velvet, they should teare; rings, and Jewels set with precious stones, they should bruse in mortars, that the same mought be to no vse, &c. And so was it done. Henry Knighton writeth, that when the rebelles burnt the Sauoy, one of them (contrary to the Proclamation) toke a goodly siluer peece and hid it in his bosome, but an other that espied him, tolde his fellowes, who forthwith hurried him and the peece of plate into the fire, saying, we be zealous of truth and iustice, and not thæues, or robbers. After this they getting a rich garment of the Dukes (commonly called a Jacke, or Jackquit) setting it on a speares point, for a marke, they shot at it with their bowes and arrows, but when they coulde that way doe it little hurte, they toke it downe, and laying it on the ground, with their swordes and axes they all to broke it. To the number of two and thirtie of those rebels entred a seller of the Sauoy, where they dranke so much of sweet Wines, that they were not able to come out in time, but were shut in with wood and stones that mured by the doore, where they were heard crying and calling seuen daies after, but none came to helpe them out till they were dead.

In this meane time the Commons of Kent brake vp the Fleet, and let the prisoners goe where they would: they destroyed and burnt many houses, and defaced the beauty of Fleetestrate: from thence they went to the Temple to destroy it, and plucked downe the houses, tooke off the tyles of the other buildinges left, went to the Church, toke out all the bookes, and remembraunces that were in hutches of the prelates of the Lawe, caried them into the high strate, and there burnt them; this house they spoiled for wraoth they bare to the Pryor of Saint Iohns, into whom it belonged: after a number of them had sacked this Temple, what with labour, and what with Wine, having ouercome, they lay downe vnder the walles, and housing, and were dayne like swine, one of them killing an other for olde grudge and hatred, and others also made quicke dispatch of them. A number of them that burnt the Temple, went from thence towarde the Sauoy, destroying all the houses that belonged to the Hospitall of Saint Iohn: and after they went to the place of the Bishop of Chester, by the Strand, where Iohn Fordham remained elect of Durham, they entred his seller, rousing out the tunnes of Wine, drinking excessively, not dooing any more harme. Then they wente towards the Sauoy, burning many houses of questmongers. At the last they came to the Sauoy, brake the gates, entered the house, came to the war-drope, tooke out all the torches they could finde, which they set a fire, and with them bent all the feather beddes, ccuerlets (whereof one with armes was esteemed worth 1000. markes) and all other goods that they might finde, with the houses, and buildings belonging thereunto, which were left by the Commons of the Citie of London. And (as it was saide) they found thre barreles of gunne powder, which they thought had bene golde, or silver, those they cast into the fire, which more suddenly then they thought, blew vp the Hall, destroyed the houses and almost themselves: from thence they went to Westminster, burned diuers houses, and amongst other the house of Iohn Buterwike vnder Shyrine of Wiblese, they broke the prison at Westminster, and returned to London by Holborne, and before the Church of Saint Sepulchre, burnt the house of Simon the Hostiler and others, they brake the prison of Newgate, let forth the prisoners, &c.

The same Thursday, the said Commons went to Saint Martins le Grand in London, and tooke from the high Altar in that Church one Roger Legat chiefe silar (or questmonger) led him into Cheape, and cut off his head: at that time also they beheaded xviii. in diuers places of the Citie. During which time diuers of the Commons went vnto the Tower, there to haue spoken with the king, but could not be heard, wherefore they besieged the Tower on that side towards Saint Katherine's. The other Commons that were in the Citie went to the Hospitall of Saint Iohn, and by the way burnt the house of Roger Legat lately beheaded, they burnt all the houses belonging to Saint Iohns, and then bent the sayre Priory of the Hospitall of Saint Iohn, causing the same to burne by the space of seuen daies after. At what time the King being in a Turret of the Tower, and seeing the mannours of Sauoy, the Priory of Saint Iohns Hospitall, and other houses on fire, he demaunted of his counsell what was best to doe in that extremitie, but none of them could counsaile in that case. The King there in a Tower towards Saint Katherine's made Proclamation that all people should depart to their homes peaceably, and he would pardon them all their trespasses: but they with one voice cried, they would not goe before they had the traitors within the Tower, and charters to free them from all seruice, and of other matters which they would demaund: this the King granted, and caused a Clarke to write in their presence as follooweth.

Richard King of England and of Fraunce, doth greatly thanke his god Commons, because they so greatly desire to see and hold him for their king, and doth pardon to them all manner of trespasses, misprisons, and felonies done before this time, and willet and commaundeth from hence forth, that every one hasten to his owne dwelling, and set downe all his graunces in writing, and send it vnto him, and he will by aduise of his lawfull Lordes, and good counsell provide such remedy as shall be profitable to him, to them, and to the whole Realme. Whereunto he set his signet in their presence, and sent it vnto them by two knights, one of them standing vp in a chaire aboue the rest, that euery one might heare. During which time the king remained in the Tower, to his great grieffe, for when the Commons heard the writting, they said it was but a mockery, and therfore returned to London, proclayming through the Citty, that all the men of Lawe, all they of the Chancery, and of the Exchequer, and all that could make any wytt, or letter, should be beheaded wheresocuer they might be found. The whole number of the common people, were at that time diuided into thre parts, of the which one part was attending to destroy the mannor of Highbery, and other places belonging to the Prior of Saint Iohn: Another company lay at the Piles ende East of the Citty: The thirde kept at the Tower hill, there to spoyle the king of such victuals as were brought to wards him. The company assembled on the Piles end, sent to commaund the king, that he should come to them without delay, vnarmed, or without any force, which if he refused to doe, they would surely pull downe the Tower, neither should hee escape aliae; who taking counsell of a few, by leuen of the Clocke the king rode to the Piles end, with his moier in a whirlicote or chariot as we now terme it, & the Carles of Buckingham, Kent, Warwicke, and Orford, Sir Thomas Percie, Sir Robert Knowles, and the Mayor of London, with diuers other knights, and Esquires, Sir Aubery de Vere bare the kings sword. Thus with a few vnarmed, the king went towards the rebels in great feare: and so the gates of the Tower being set open, a great multitude of them entred the same. There was the same time in the Tower 600. warlike men furnished with armour and weapon, expert men in armes, and 600. archers, all which did quaille in stomacke. For the basest of the rustickes, not many together, but euery one by himselfe, durst presume to enter the kings chamber, or his mothers. with their weapons, to put in feare each of the men of warre, knights or other: many of them came into the kings priuy chamber, and plaid the wantons, in sitting, lying and sporting them on the kings bed: and that more is, inuited the kings mother to kisse with them, yet durst none of those men of warre (strange to be said) once withstand them: they came in and out like masters, that in times past were slaues of most vile conditiō. Whilist therfore these rusticks fought the Archbishop with terrible noyse and fury running vp and downe, at length finding one of his seruants, they charge him to bring them where his master was, whom they named traitor, which seruant daring do none other, brought them to the Chappell; where, after Masse had bene said, and hauing receiued the communion, the Archbishop was busie in his praers, for not vnknowing of their cormning and purpose, hee had passed the last night in confessing of his sinnes, and in deuout praers. When therfore he heard they were come, with great constancie he said to his men, Let vs now goe, surely it is best to die, when it is no pleasure to liue, and with that the tormentors entering, cried, Where is the traitor: The Archbishop answered, behold, I am the Archbishop whom you seeke, not a traitor. They therfore laid handes on him, and drew him out of the Chappell, they drew him out of the Tower gates, to the Tower hill, where being compassed about with many thousands, and seeing swords about his head drawne in excessive number, threatening to him death, he said unto them thus: what is it dære brethren you purpose to doe, what is mine offence committed against you, for which ye will kill me, you were best to take hede, that if I be killed, who am your passor, there come not on you, the indignation of the iust reuenger, or at the least, for such a fact all England be put vnder interdiction: he could vnnearth pronounce these words, before they cryed out with an horrible noise, that they neither feared the interdiction, nor the Pope to be aboue them. The Archbishop seeing death at hand, with comfortabie words, as he was an eloquent man, and wise, beyond all wise men of the realme; lastly, after forgiveness graunted to the executioner that should behead him, he kneeling downe offered his necke to him that should strike it off, being striken in the necke, but not deadly, he putting his hand to his necke, said thus, a ha, it is the hand of God, he had not remoued his hand from the place, where the payne was, but that being sodainly striken, his fingers ends being cut off, and part of the arteries, he fell downe, but yet he died not, till being mangled with 8. strokes in the necke, and in the head, he fulfilled most worthy martyrdome. There lay his body vnburied all that Friday, and the morrow till afternone, none daring to deliuer his body to the sepulture, his head these wicked took, and nayling thereon his hode, they fire it on a pole, and set it on London Bridge, in place where before stood the head of Sir Iohn Minstarrow. This Archbishop Simon Tibald alias Sudbury, sonne to Nicholas Tibald gentleman, borne in the towne of Sudbury in Suffolke, Doctour of both lawes, was 18. yeres Bishop of London, in the which time he builded a goodly Colledge, in place where his fathers house stode, and indued it with great possessions, and furnished the same with secular Clerkes and other ministers, valued at the suppression 122. pound. 18. shillings in lands by yere. He builded the upper end of S. Gregories Church at Sudbury. After being translated to the Archbishopricke of Canterbury, in An. 1375. he reedified the walles of that Citie, from the West gate (which he builded) to the North gate, which had been destroyed by the Danes before the conquest of William the bastard. He was slaine as ye haue heard, and afterwards buried in the Cathedral Church of Canterbury. There died with him Sir Robert Hales a most valiant knight, Lord of S. Johns and treasurer of England, and John Legge one of the Kings sericants at armes, and a Franciscan Friar, named William Apledore the Kings Confessor. Richard Lions also a famous lapidary or goldsmith, late one of the Sherifs of London, was drawne out of his house and beheaded in Cheape. There were that day beheaded manie as well Flemings as Englishmen for no cause, but to fulfill the crueltie of the rude Commons: for it was a solemne pastime to them, if they could take any that was not swozne to them, to take from such a one his hode with their accustomed clamour, and forthwith to behead him: neither did they shew any reuerence vnto sacred places, for in the very Churches did they kill whom they had in hatred, they fetcht 13. Flemings out of the Augustine Friers church in London, and 17. out of another church, and 32. in the Vintrie, and so forth in other places of the Citie, & in Southwarke, al which they beheaded, except they

they could plainly pronounce bread and cheese, for if their speech sounded any thing on bꝛot, oꝝ caluse, off went their heads, as a sure marke they were Flemings.

The King comming to the Piles end, the place befoze recited, was soze a fraide, beholding the wood commons, who with froward countenance required many things which they befoze had put in wꝛitings to be confirmed by the Kings letters patents.

The 1. that all men should be frée from seruitude and bondage, so as from thencefoꝛth there should be no bondmen.

The 2. that he should pardon all men of what estate soeuer, all maner actions and insurrections committed, and all maner treasons, felonies, transgressions and extorsions, by any of them done, and to graunt them peace.

The 3. that al men from thencefoꝛth might be enfranchised to buy and sell in euery Countie, Citie, borough, town, faire, market, and other place within the Realme of England.

The 4. that no acre of land holden in bondage oꝝ seruice, should be holden, but soꝝ 4. pence, and if it had been holden soꝝ lesse afozetime, it should not hereafter be inhaunfed.

These and many other things they required: mozeoner they tolde him, he had been euilly gouerned til that day, but from that tyme he must be gouerned other wise.

The King perceiuing he could not escape except he graunted to their request, yeelded to the same. And because the Chanceloꝝ was beheaded, the King made the Earle of Arundale soꝝ the time Chanceloꝝ, and keeper of the great seale, and also made diuers Clarke to wꝛite Charters, patents, and protections graunted to the Commons, soꝝ the sozefaid matters, without taking fine, soꝝ the seale, oꝝ wꝛiting thereof; and so to ward euen, the King crauing licence departed from them. The next day being Saturday and the 15. of Iune, a great number of the Commons came to the abbey of Westminster, and there found Iohn Inworth Parthall of the Parthallep, and master of the prisoners there, imbracing a marble pillar of Saint Edwards thꝛine soꝝ his defence, against his enemies, they plucked his armes from the pillar, and led him into cheape, where they cut off his head. In which time they toke out of Wyndestræte one Iohn Greenfield, led him into cheape, & cut off his head, notwithstanding that the King had at this time made proclamation thꝛough the Citie, that euery one should peaceably goe into his countrey, without doing further euill, whercunto they would not assent. The same day after dinner, about two of the clocke, the King went from the wardrobe, called the Hopall in London toward Westminster, attended on by the number of 200. persons, to visit Saint Edwards thꝛine, and to see if the Commons had done any mischief there: The Abbot and couent of that abbey, with the Chanons and bicars of Saint Stephens Chappell, met him in rich Copes, with procession, and led him by the charnell house into the abbey, then to the Church, and so to the high altar, where hee deuotely prayed, and offered. After which he spake with the Anchoze, to whom hee confessed him selfe, then hee went to the Chapell called our Lady in the pwe, where he made his prayers :

Which being done, the King made proclamation, that all the commons of the countrey, that were in London should mete him in Smithfield, which was done accordingly, and when the King was come with his people, he stode towards the East, nere to Saint Barilmewes pyory, and the commons towards the West in foyme of battayle. The King therefore sent to them, to shew them that their fellows the Cister men were gone from thenceforth to lue in peace, and that he would graunt to them the like foyme of peace, if it would please them to accept thereof. Their chiefe Captaine named War-tyler of Spaidstone, he I say being a crafty fellow, of an excellent wit, but lacking grace, answered, that peace he desired, but with conditions to his liking, minding to keede the King with faire words, till the next day, that he might in y night haue compassed his peruerse purpose, for they thought y same night to haue spoyled the citie, the King first being slaine, and the great Lords that cleaued to him, and to haue burnt the Citie, by setting fire in foure parts thereof, but God that resisteth the proude, did sodainely disappoint him. For where the foyme of peace was in thre seuerall Charters written, and thre sent to him, none of them could please him: wherefore at length the King sent to him one of his Knights called Sir Iohn Newton, not so much to command as to intreate him (for his pride was well ynough knowen) to come and talke with him about his owne demands, to haue them put in his charter, of the which demands, I will put one in this Chronicle, that it may the moze plainely appaere, the other to be contrary to reason. First, he would haue a commission for him and his, to behead all Lawyers, escheters, and other whatsoeuer, that were learned in the law, or communicated with the law, by reason of their office, for he had conceived in his mind that this being brought to passe, all things after ward should be ordered according to the fancy of the common people: and indeede it was said, that with great pride, he bad but the day be-foze said, putting his hand to his lips, that befoze 4. dayes came to end, all the lawes of England should procede from his mouth. When Sir Iohn Newton was in hand with him for dispatch, he answered with indignation, if thou art so hasty, thou maiest get thee backe againe to thy master, I will come when it pleaseth me: notwithstanding he followed on horsebacke a slow pace, and by the way there came to him a dublet maker of London, named Iohn Ticle, who had brought to the commons 60. dublets which they bought and ware, for the which dublets he demaunded 30. markes, but could haue no payment, Wartyler answered him, friend appeale thy selfe, thou shalt be well paid or this day be ended, keepe thee nere me, I will be thy creditor: And there with he spurred his horse, departed from his company, and came so nere the King, that his horse head touched the crope of the Kings horse, and the first word he said was this, Sir King, seest thou all ponde people? yea truly quoth the King, wherefore saist thou so? because said he, they be all at my commandement, and haue sworne to me faith and truth, to doe all that I will haue them.
In god time said the King, I will well it be so. Then said Wartyler, beleeuest thou King, that these people, and as many moe as be in London at my commandement, will depart from thée thus, without hauing thy letters: no said the King, ye shall haue them, they be ordeyned for you, and shall be deliuered to euery each of them, with which words, Wat Tylar séeing the Knight Sir Iohn Newton néere to him on horsebacke, bearing the Kings sword, was offended and said, it had become him better to be on fote in his presence. The Knight (not hauing forgot his old accustomed manhood) answered, that it was no harme, séeing himselfe was also on horsebacke: which words so offended Wat, that he drew his dagger, and offered to strike at the Knight, calling him traitor: the Knight answered, that he lyed, and drew his dagger likewise. Wat Tylar not suffering such a contumely done to him befoze his rustickes, made as if he would haue runne on the Knight. The King therfore séeing the Knight in danger, to asswage the rigoz of War, for the time, commaunded the Knight to light on fote, and to deliuer his dagger vnto the said Waler, and when his proud minde could not so be pacified, but he would also haue his sword, the Knight answered, it was the Kings sword, and quoth he, thou art not woorthy to haue it, nor thou durst aske it of me, if here were no moze but thou and I. By my faith said Wat Tiler, I shall neuer eate till I haue thy head, and would haue run on the Knight: and with that came to the King, William Walworth, Maior of London, and many Knights and Esquires on the Kings side, affirming that it were great shame, such as had not been heard of, if in their presence, they should permit a noble Knight so shamefully to be murdered befoze his face, wherefoze he ought to be rescued speedily, and Tiler to be arrested. Which thing being heard, the King, although he were but tender of péeres, taking boldnesse vnto him, commaunded the Maior of London to set hand on him. The Maior being of an incomparable boldnesse and manhode, without any doubting, straight arrested him on y head, Wat Tighler furiously strake the Maior with his dagger, but hurte him not by meane he was armed, then the Maior drew his baselard, and gréuouly wounded Wat in the necke, and gaue him a great blow on the head, in which confusie, an esquire of the Kings house, called Iohn Cauendish, drew his sword and wounded him twise or thrise, euen vnto death, and Wat spurring his horse, cried to the commons to reuenge him, his horse bare him about foure score fote from thence where he fell downe halfe dead, and by and by they which attended on the King, inuironed him all about, where by he was not séene of his company, and other thrust him in with their weapons in diuers places of his body, and then they drew him from amongst the peoples séete into the hospitall of Saint Bartilmewe: which when the commons perceiued, they cryed out that their Captaine was traitterously slaine, and hartening one another to reuenge his death, bending their bowes, the King, shewing both wisdom and courage, picking his horse with the spurs, rode to them, and said: What a woork is this my men, what meane you to do, will you shote at your King: be not quarrelous, nor sozpy for the death of a traitor and ribald: I will be your King, I am your Captaine and leader, follow me into the field, there to haue whatsoeuer you will require.

should set fire on the houses in Smithfield, where their Captaine was slain. They therefore followed him into the open field, and the souldiers that were with him, as yet not knowing whether they would kill the King, or be in rest and depart home with the Kings Charter.

The Mayor of London rayed a power, and rescued the King.

In the meane time the Mayor of London onely with one servant, riding speedily into the Citie, began to cry, ye good Citizens helpe your King, that is to be murdered, and succour me your Mayor that am in the like danger, or if you will not succour me, yet leaue not your King destitute, when the Citizens had heard this, in those hearts the loue of the King was ingrafted, so dauidely, seemely arrayed, to the number of a thousand men tarried in the streets for some one of the Knights to lead them to the King, and by fortune Sir Robert Knowles came in that instant, whom they all requested to be their leader, least comming out of order, and not in good array they might easily be broken: who gladly brought part of them, Sir Parducase Dalbart, and other Knights brought the rest to the Kings presence. When the Mayor came to Smithfield and did not finde Wat Tygkhar, (as he left him wounded) he greatly maruailed, demanding where the traytor was, and it was tolde him that he was carried into the Hospitall of Saint Bartilmewe, and laid in the Masters Chamber, the Mayor went straight thither and made him to be carried into Smithfield, and there caused him to be beheaded, his head to be set on a pole, and borne before him to the King then resting in the field, and the King caused it to be borne nere vnto him, therewith to abash the Commons, greatly thanking the Mayor for that acte.

Record. R. 2.

That the Mayor beheaded by commandment of the Mayor.

The King, and those that were with him, Knights and Esquiers, reioycing of the vn hoped for comming of the Mayor, and those armed men, sodainly compassed all the multitude of the Commons.

There might a man haue scene a wonderfull change of Gods right hand, how the Commons did now throw downe their weapons, and fall to the ground, beseeching pardon, which lately before did glory that they had the Kings life in their power, now they hide themselves in caues, ditches, cozenefieldes, &c. The Knights therefore coueting to be reuenged, besought the King to permit them to take off the heads of an hundred or two of them, but the King not condescending to their request, commaunded the charter which they had demanded, written and sealed, to be deliuered vnto them for the time, to auoyde moze mischief, knowing that Essex was not as yet pacified, nor Kent stayde, the commons and rustickes of which Countreyes were readie to rise agayne, if he satisfied not their pleasure the sooner. The tenour of which Charter, in my larger Chronicle is set do wne. The Commons hauing got this Charter departed home, but ceased not from their former euill doings.

William Walworth Mayor of London Knighted, the order how.

The rude people being thus dispersed and gone, the King commaunded William Walworth to put a basenet on his head, for feare of that which might follow, and the Mayor requested to know for what cause he should so doe, with all was quieted, the King answered, that he was much bound to him, and therefore therefore, he should be made knight, the Mayor againe answered, that he was not worthy, neither able to take such estate vpon him, for he was but a Merchant, and to liue by his merchandise, notwithstanding at the last, the King made him put on his basenet, and then toke a sword with both his hands, and strongly with a good will strake him on the necke, and the same day he made thre other Citizens knights for his sake in the same place, which were Iohn Philpot, Nicholas Brembar, and Robert Laund Aldermen, and Sir Iohn Candish in Smithfield was knighted. The King gaue to Sir William Walworth 100. pound land, and to the other 40. pound land, to them and their heires for euer: vpon the sand-hill towards Iseldoune were created the Carls Marshall, and Pembroke, and shortly after Nickolas Twisford, and Adam Francis Aldermen, were also made knights. Sir Robert Knowles, for his good seruice in the Citie, was by the Kings commaundement made a free man of the Citie.

The King with his Lords and all his company, orderly entred into the Citie of London with great ioy. The King went to the Lady Princesse his mother, who was then lodged in the Towzeropall called the Quenes Warreboze, and there she had remayned two dayes and two nights right soze abashed, but when she saw the King her sonne, she was greatly reioyced, and said, Ah saye sonne, what great sorrow haue I suffered for you this day: The King answered, and said, certainly Madame, I know it well, but now reioyce and thanke God, for I haue this day recovered mine heritage, and the Realme of England, which I had nere hand lost.

The Archbishops head was taken downe off the Bridge, and Wat Tilers head was set in that place.

ouerlong it were in this booke to set downe the troubles at Saint Albons, by the bond men there against the Abbot, and other, for liberties which they claymed, as the like did in other places, committing many abominable acts, but somewhat to speake of them within the parts of Suffolke and Norfolke.

The Saturday wherof we haue befoze spoken, that the tempest might seme to be generall, God sent his wrath into the partes of Suffolke and Norfolke, by sending Celler men to moue the people that liued in quietnesse, to raise like commotions, and to turne the hearts of the bondemen or seruants against their Lords. The which making to their Captaine a most ingratious pylest named Iohn Wraw, who had been at London the day befoze, and was instructed by Wat Tiler, easily assembled a multitude of those common people. These according to the manner of them at London, ouerthrew houses and manors of great men and of Lawyers, slew the Students of the Lawe, and catching Sir Iohn Cauendish a Iustice of the Realme, some say Lord chief Iustice, beheaded him, and set his head on the pilloze in the towne of Bury, Sir Iohn of Cambridge, Bishopp of Bury, they caught and strooke off his head, his body was left naked in the field the space of fve dayes, none presuming to burie it, for feare of the Kniskikes, his head was set on the pilloze by the head of Sir Iohn Cauendish. Then entred they the Cloyster of the monasterie toke Sir Iohn Lakingnich keeper of the Baronie, halled him out with great noise, of Poꝛwich.

So small multitude of Commons being gotte together vnder the leading of a certaine Dyer of Poꝛwich, called Iohn Liciſtar, beganne to worke such maſtrie as in other places had been put in practice, putting their hands vnto robbery, so that no place might be free from them: they thought to haue got to them William de Viſſard Earle of Suffolke, that they might doe their businesse vnder colour of his authoritie, but the Earle being warned of their comming, sodainely rose from Supper, and taking his tourney thzough Woodes and desarts came to Saint Albons, and from thence to the King, ſayning himſelfe to bee the Lackey of Sir Roger de Boys, and bearing a Mallet behinde him. The Commons thus deceived, forth with leaſed vpon the houses of other Knights, and finding them, compelled them to be ſwoꝛne to ride thzough the Countrey with them, which if they had denied they had died for it.

The Knights that were thus compelled, were the Lord Schales, Sir William Morley, Sir Iohn de Brues, Sir Steuen de Hales, Sir Robert de Sale, which Sir Robert blaming their doings, was smitten into the Brayne by one of his bondemen. The other perceiuing that they muſt diſſemble, or dye a ſhamefull death, determined to ſay all things was well. Whereupon being brought in ſanour with Liciſtar, (who named himſelfe King of the Commons) choſe Syr Steuen Hales (because hee was a comely Knight) to come befoze him, and to take the aſſay of his meates, and to the other he appoynted other officers.

The Knights with their companions, when they came to a Towne named Ignigham, not farre diſtant from Newmarket, they met with the Biſhop of Poꝛwich Sir Henry Spencer well armed, for as he was at his manoz of Burley, nere to Ochem Caſtle, not farre from Stamford, he heard of the Poꝛfolke men, and determined to goe againſt them, he had not at that time paſt an 8. ſpeares, and a ſmall number of archers, yet beholding the Knights, and ſome of the Commons, he commaunded them vpon their allegiance to tel him, if there were any of the Kings traytors. The Knights for feare of the Commons, diſſembled to anſwere, the Biſhop willed them boldly to goe to, and if there were any of the Kings traytors, to deliuer them to him: the Knights taking courage, answered that two of the cheefeſt ſtirrers among the whole company were preſent, and that the thirde was gone forth to pꝛouide their dinner, & herewith they ſhelued the cauſe of their tourney.

ourney. The Bishop straightwayes commanded these two to lose their heads, and the third he himselfe went to seeke, whose head also he caused to be cut off, & their heads were set vp at Newmarket. Then the Bishop with the Knights hasted towards Norfolk, meaning to come to a place called Northwalsham, where the Commons were determined to stay for the Kings answer.

In passing the countrey the Bishops number increased, for diuers knights and many gentlemen of the countrey that layd for feare of the Commons, seeing the Bishop in armour, they ranne forth and ioyned with him. The Bishop therefore when he came to the said place, hauing about him a seemely company, he found that the Commons had entrenched themselves after the manner of warre, and had set vpon the rampier of their trench, windowes, doores, tables, boordes, with pales for their defence: behind them, they had placed their carts, as if they meant not to flee, and forthwith the Marshall Bishop commanded his trumpets to sound and taking a speare in his hand, set spurs to his horse, and is caried forth vpon them with such a courage, that with swift race he gafe the trench of them, and as he had bin a foming boze rode amongst his enemies where they were thickest, striking this man through, and felling that man downe, and ceased not till the company following hauing got the trench were ready to fight, those of the Bishops retinue therefore fought very sharply, and so likewise did the Commons, till at length the Commons fled, but the Bishop stopped them, knocking them downe, till the chiefe leaders of the tumult being taken with their King Iohn Litstar, (so many as pleased him being saued alive) he got the full victorie. The Bishop brought the said Iohn Litstar vnto drawing, hanging, and heading: and so the country was in peace.

Thus hauing shewed a few things which were done in Norfolk, I passe ouer to write of the rest done in that and other countries, but what they ment against the King, the confession of Iacke Straw declareth, who was chiefe amongst them, next to Wat Tyler. This man being taken, when at London he should by iudgement giuen by the Maior, lose his head; the Maior spake openly to him thus. Iohn (quoth he) behold thy death is at hand without all doubt, and there is no way through which thou mayest hope to escape, wherefore for thy soules health, without making any lye, tell vs what you purposed amongst you to haue done, to what ende did you assemble the Commons? And when he had stayde a while as doubtfull, what to say, deferring his answer, the Maior added, Thou knowest surely, O Iohn, that the thing which I demaunde of thee, if thou doe it, the same shall redounde to thy soules health, &c. He therefore animated with sayre promises, beganne as followeth.

Conspiracy of

The same time (sayeth he) that we came to Blacke Heath, when we sent for the King, we purposed to haue murdered al the knights, Esquires and gentlemen that should haue come with him, and to haue ledde the King royally besed, by and downe, that with the sight of him, all men especially the common people might haue come vnto vs the more boldely, and when we had got together an innumerable multitude, we would haue sodainely put to death in euery Countrey, the Loyds and masters of the common people, in whom might appeare to be either counsell or resistance against vs: and specially we would haue destroyed the Knights of Saint Johns, lastly we would haue killed the King himselfe, and all men that had been of any possession, Bishops, Monkes, Chanons, Parsons, to be briefe, we would haue dispatched: one-ly begging Friers should haue liued, that might haue suffred for ministring the Sacraments in the whole Realme, for we should haue made Kings, Wat Tyler in Kent, and in euery other shire one. But because this our purpose was hindered by the Archbishop, we studied how to bring him shortly to his ende.

Against the same day that Wat Tyler was killed, we purposed that euening (because that the poore people of London seemed to fauour vs) to set fire in foure corners of the Citie, and so to haue burnt it, and to haue deuised the riches at our pleasures amongst vs. He added that these things they purposed to haue done, as God should helpe him at the end of his life.

beheaded.

Principall Captaines.

After this confession made, he was beheaded, and his head set on London Bridge by Wat Tilers and many other.

The principall leaders of the Commons were Wat Tyler, the second John Scawe, the third John Kirkby, the fourth Alen Threder, the fift Thomas Scotte, the sixth Ralph Rugge: these and many others were leaders of the Kentish and Essex men. At Mildenhall and Bury in Suffolke, was Robert Westbrom, that made himselfe King, and was most famous after John Wraw, who being a priest would not let crowne vpon crowne, but left the name of King and crowne to the said Robert. At Dor which John Lixlar a dier, exercised the name and power of a King, till he was taken and hanged for his paynes.

power, and rode into Kent.

Wat Tyler being killed, Jacke Straw and other their principall Captaines hanged or headed, the hope and confidence of the Commons decayed, but because the mindes of the King and nobles was yet wauering, seeing the people ready to mischief, they graunted to them Charters of manumission and suffered them to depart, the which being done, the King caused an army to be assembled from London, and sent into all Countreies that those who were his friends should make haste to come to him to London, furnished with horse and armour, and it came to passe that within thre daies he had a xl. thousand horsemen about him in seemely fort armed, he mustred them on Blacke Heath, himselfe ryding on a great courser, with his standard borne before him: when therefore so mighty an army was assembled, the King was aduertised that the Kentish men had euenly conspired, wherupon he forthwith set forthward,

but by the mediation of the Nobles and great men of Kent that undertooke for them, he was stayde and pacified with them, and then first Iustices were sent to seeke and inquire of malefactours, and that Countrey became quiet at the sight of them. Then the Maior of London sitting in Iudgement, caused the malefactours to be tried, as well of the Citie as also of Kent, Essex, South-sex, Suffolke, and Suffolke and other Countreies, that might be taken within the liberties of the Citie, and all those whom he found guiltie of the foresaid treason, he caused to hoppe headlesse, among the which were Iacke Strawe, Iohn Kirkeby, Alen Threder, &c. also Iohn Starling of Essex, that glozied to haue beheaded the Archbishop, was beheaded himselfe.

The king remained now at London, now at Waltham, with a great army of armed men, considering what was to be done for the commoditie of the Realme. At length the Counsell thought good to send the kings commission into every Shire, for the resisting of the disquieters of the peace of the Kingdome. These commissions did much comfort the faithfull subiects, and troubled the false, for they were now compelled to seeke corners, that before toke upon them to doe all things abroade, Lawyers now durst come forth of their dennes, and those which before fled from the tyrannie of the time, looked for those that now feared Iudgement and iustice to be done on them.

The commons being thus feared, but not in all places alike, they of Essex gathering a new multitude together at Byllica, a village nere to Hatfield Deuerell, decreed either to enjoy liberty gotten by force, or to dye in fighting for the same, they sent to the king then being at Waltham messengers to know if hee thought good to permit them to enjoy their permitted libertie, like to their Lords, and that they should not be compelled to come to courts, but only to great Leets twice in the yeare, vnto the which the king answered thus. Oh miserable and hatefull both to land and sea, not worthe to liue: doe ye require to be equall to your Lords? We were worthe to be put to most shamefull death: but sith ye are come as messengers, ye shall not die now, to the end ye may declare our answeres to your fellowes: declare to them therefore on the kings behalfe, that as they were husbandmen and bondmen, so shall they remaine in bondage, not as before, but more vile, without comparison farre, vnto this. Whilest we liue, and by Gods sufferance shall gouerne the kingdome, with witte, strength and goods, we will endeavour our selues to keepe you vnder, so that the due ty of your seruice, may be an example for posteritie, and that your matches both present, and that shall succede, may euer haue before their eyes, as it were in a glasse, your miserie, and to you matter to curse, and feare to commit the like. When the messengers were gone, there was sent straight waies into Essex, Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, and sir Thomas Percy brother to the earle of Northumberland, to repress the boldnesse of the said commons.

These comunons had fortified themselves with ditches and carriages: nevertheless, although there was a great number of them, with small businessse they were scattered into the woods, where the Lords inclosed them, least any of them might escape: and it came to passe, that five hundred of the were slaine.

Maior of London caused malefactours of the Citie, of Kent, Essex, Suffolke, & Suffolke that might be taken, to hoppe headlesse.

and eight hundred of their hozses taken, the other that escaped this slaughter being gotten together, hasted to Colchester, and began to stir the townsmen to a new tumult, and when they profited not there, they went to Sudbury; but the Lord Fitz Walter and sir John Harlestone followed them, and slew as many of them as they list, and shut up the rest in prisons. The King came to his manor of Haunering at Boure, and after to Chelmsford, where he appointed Sir Rob. Trisilian his Justice to sit and enquire of the malefactours, wherfore the men saring the evils that hung ouer their heads, there came aboute fife hundred humbly to the King barefooted and bareheaded, beseeching him of pardon and mercie. To whom pardon was graunted, with condition, to deliuer the stirrers of the said trouble. It came therefore to passe, that many were committed to warde, vpon whom, the Justice charged foure and twentie men of their conscience to say the truth, and many being condemned, were put to execution, by drawing and hanging, nine or tenne being hanged on one beame. The Justices that befoze had sit in Essex, Kent, London, and other places, soe all the multitude that were to be executed, vled to head the Commons, till nowe it seemed not a kinde of death answerable to so many & manifest crimes. These things were done in Essex, the King being present: the like by his Justices was done in other countries.

Doctrine of John Ball by him taught.

· The tenth of July John Ball priest being taken at Couentry, and brought to Saint Albons, was there befoze the King condemned, and had iudgement giuen him by Sir Robert Trisilian Knight a most skillful Justice, as a traitour to be drawne, hanged, headed and bowelled, whose death was respited untill the Monday at the intercession of William Bishop of London, who being carefull for his soules health, obtained that space for his repentance. This man a twentie yeres together and moze, preached in diuers places those things which he knew to be liking to the common people, flandering adwell ecclesiasticall persons, as secular Lords, seeking thereby, rather the beneuolence of the common people, then merite towards God: he taught that tithes were not to be giuen to the church men, except the partie that should giue the same were richer then the Vicar or parson that should receiue it. Also that tithes and oblations were to be withdrawen from Curates: if the parishioners or parishioner were of better life then the Curate. Also that no man was mate for the kingdome of God, that was not bozne in matrimony, he taught many other things too long to rehearse, for the which he was prohibited of the Bishops in whose diocesses he had attempted these things, that he should not preach from thenceforth in any Church: he went forth therefore into the streets and wayes, and into fields to preach, & there wanted not of the commons that came to heare him, whom he euer sought to allure to his sermons, by detracting of the prelates. At the length being excommunicated, and yet not desisting, hee was committed to prison by Simon the Archbishop of Canterbury, and William Bishop of London, where he prophesied that he should be deliuered by twentie thousand of his friends, which came so to passe in the foresaid time of troubles, when all prisons were broken up, and the prisoners giuen forth, and when hee was so deliuered, hee followed them, instiga-

ting them to committe much euill, and preaching that so it ought to be done. And that his doctrine might infect the moze number of people, at Blacke heath, where there were many thousands of the Commons assembled, he began his Sermon in this manner :

When Adam dolue and Eue span, who was then a gentleman ?

And continuing his begunne Sermon, he sought by the worde of that p<sup>ro</sup>uerbe which he took for his theame, to introduce, and p<sup>ro</sup>oue, that from the beginning, all were made a like by nature, and that bondage or seruitude was brought in by iniust opp<sup>re</sup>ssion of naughty men, against the will of God: for if it had pleased God to haue made bondmen, he would haue appointed them from the beginning of the worlde, who should haue been slaue, and who Lord. They ought to consider therefore, that now there was a time giuen them by God, in the which, laying aside the yoke of continuall bondage, they might, if they would, enioy their long wished for libertie. Wherefore he admonished them, that they should be wise, and after the manner of a good husband that tilled his ground, and did cutte away all nop<sup>er</sup>some weedes that were accustomed to growe and opp<sup>re</sup>ss the fruite, they should make haste to doe now at this p<sup>re</sup>sent the like. First, the Archbishop and great men of the kingdome were to be slaine: after, Lawyers, Justiciars, and Questmongers: lastly, whomsoever they knewe to be like heereafter hurtfull to the Commons, they should dispatch out of the land, for so might they purchase safety to themselves hereafter, if the great men being once taken away, there were among them equall libertie, all one nobilitie and like dignitie, and semblable authoritie or power. These, and many such mad deuises he preached, which made the common people to esteeme of him in such manner, as they cryed out, he should be Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancello<sup>r</sup> of the Realme, for he onely reserved the honour. Moreover, he had sent to the borders of the Commons in Essex a Letter full of riddles or darke sentences, exhorting them to p<sup>ro</sup>ceede in their begun enterprises, which Letter was after found in the bondget of one that should be hanged, the tenour whereof was thus :

John Shepe, sometime Saint-Mary Priest of Poike, and now of Colchester, greeteth well John namelesse, and John Milner, and John Carrar, and biddeth them that they be ware of Gillinbrough, and standeth together in Gods name, and biddeth Pierce Plowman goe to his worke, and chastice well Hob the robber, and take with him John Trueman, and all his fellowes, and no moe, John the Miller hath yground small small, the Kings sonne of heauen shall pay for all, beware or ye be woe, know your friend from your foe, haue<sup>t</sup> ynough, and saith hoe, and doe well and better, and flæth sinne, and sa keth peace, and holde therein, and so biddeth John Trueman and all his fellowes.

This letter John Ball confessed himselfe, that he had written and sent to the Commons: moze, he confessed to William then Bishop of London, to Walter Lee Knight, and John Perfoot Notarie, that a certain company of his sect, were confederate to go rounde about all England, and to preach these points which he had taught, naming I. W. N. A. L. B. masters of Artes. Whereupon he added, that except remedy were had, they within two yeres space would destroy the whole Realme, and this confession, vnder a certaine foyme was brought into a publike instrument. This Sir Iohn Ball was hanged and headed at Saint Albons, on the 15. of Iuly, the King being present, and his body being quartered, was sent to foure Cities of the Realme: some other Epistles of the said Ball haue I seene, which also I thinke good (as afoze) here to insert.

Epistle of Iohn Ball.

Iohn Ball Saint-Mary priest, græteth well all manner of men, and biideth them in name of the Trinitie, Father Sonne, and holy Ghost, stand manlike together in truth, and helpe truth, and truth shall helpe you: now reigneth pride in price, couetise is holden wise, lechery without shame, gluttonie without blame, enuie raigeth with reason, and cloth is taken in great season, God do boote for now is time, Amen.

Iacke Miller.

Iacke Miller, asketh helpe to turne his Mill aright, he hath ground small, small, the Kings son of heauen shall pay for all: loke thy Mill goe right with foure sailes, and the post stand in stedfastnes with right and might, with skill and will, let might helpe right, and skill befoze will, and right befoze might, then goeth our Mill aright: and if might goe befoze right, and will befoze skill, then is our Mill misdoight.

Iacke Trew-
man.

Iacke Trewman doeth you to vnderstand, that falseness and guile hath raigned too long:
and truth hath been set vnder a locke,
and falseness raigeth in euery flocke:

No man may come truth to, but he sing, si dederis:

Speake, spend and speed, queth Iohn of Bathon, and therefore, sinne fareth as wilde flood, true loue is away that is so good,
And clarkes for wealth wircheth them wo, God doe boote, for now is time.
I leaue out Iohn Carters Epistle, a libell, so named, &c.

A great number of the commons being indited, and hauing iudgement, at Saint Albons fiftene of them were hanged, and fourescore imprisoned, and after ward by pardon released, and on the twentieth day of Iuly the King removed to Berkhamstede.

Truce with
the Scots.

Iohn Duke of Lancaster that a little befoze these troubles began, was gone Northward to be at the day of truce or march, as y manner was euerie yere, when he heard of the hurling of the commons, in the time that they had the upper hand ouer their Lords, he was maruellously amazed, and forecasting what might follow, thought it best, with speede to make peace with the Scots, which was done befoze those tumults came to the eares of the Scots, and by them confirmed by oth for two yeres truce, that they would faithfully keepe the same.

Will. Cour-

of Canterbury.

William Courtney sonne to Hugh Courtney, Earle of Deuonshire, Doctor of Lawe, first Bishoppe of Hereford, since Bishoppe of London, was now translated to the Archbishoppiche of Canterburie on the ninth of September. And Robert Braybrooke succeeded in the Bishoppiche of London.

Thomas Hatfield Bishop of Durham deceased, he founded Durham Colledge in Orford, he also builded Durham place, betwixt London and West-

About the feast of All Saints, a Parliament was begun, which endured long, to small purpose, by reason of contention among the Lords, especially the Duke of Lancaster, and the Earle of Northumberland, whose quarrel in the end was taken up by the King, and then the Lords proceeded to treat of the Kings businesse and the Realmes, but they lingered so long in vaine, that when some effect was thought should haue succeeded, newes came of the coming to Calceys of the new Quene. The King had made his choice before to haue this woman, and had bought her with a great price and much labor, for he gaue to the Emperour, x. thousand pound, beside other great expenses, to make this marriage. Although the daughter of Barnabe Duke of Millan was offered vnto him with an inestimable some of golde. This Quenes coming therefore being vnderstood, the Parliament was prorogued, to begin againe after Christmas. There were diuers of the Nobles sent to meete the Bride, and she was conveyed with all the glory of the world vnto Douer, many both of her Countrey, and also of England, attending on her.

Parliament at London.

After the feast of the Epiphany, also the Nobilitie of the Realme assembled at London, to be present at the Kings marriage, and to do their seruice according to the custome of euery one in ancient time vsed. This Virgin named Anne, the daughter of Vseslaus King of Boheme, is at Westminster consecrated the Kings wiffe, & by the Archbishop of Canterbury is crowned Quene. There were iustices kept for the honour of such a solemnization, certaine dayes together, in which, both the Englishmen shewed their force, and the Quenes countrymen their prowess.

The King married.

In this Quenes dayes, began the detestable vse of piked shoes, tyed to their knees with chaines of siluer and gilt. Also noblewomen vsed high attyre on their heads, piked like hoznes, with long trained gownes, and rode on side saddles, after the example of the Quene who first brought that fashyon into this land, for before, women were vsed to ride asride like men. The solemnity of the marriage being ended, the parliament is now begun againe, in which, many articles are proposed and decreed, to witt, of admitting strangers to sell personally their wares, without impeachment of the merchants of England: of the abrogating of furses, and siluer garnishing of girdles &c. of the price of wines, that is, that the tunne should not excede five markes, &c.

Piked shoes, high heads, and long trained gownes, with women riding asride like men in England.

William Vfford Earle of Suffolke, in this Parliament, being elected by the knights of the shires, to pronounce on their behalfe his businesse of the realme, the very day and houre in which he should haue executed the businesse he had taken in hand, as he was going vp the staires that ledde into the chamber where all the nobilitie of the realme sate, he sodainly fell downe, and among his mens hands that were about to holde him, he yelmed vp the Choff, although being very merry, and feeling no euill, a little before, as euen at that instant he had entred Westminster hall, of whose sodaine death, not only all the nobles of the realme were greatly amazed, but all the meaner sort, for in all his life time he had shewed himselfe amiable to all men.

William Vfford Earle of Suffolke dyed suddenly.

Custome of woolles.

After his death the parliament was ended, after the marchants of England had granted to the King a subsidie, and the customes of wool for foure paires next ensuing, which the Commons called le Maltor,

In this Parliament, the Lords and Commons requesting it, Sir Richard Scrope knight was ordeyned Chauncelor as the man which in excellent knowledge & inflexible iustice, had not his like for his calling in this Realme. Sir Hugh Segraue knight was made Lord Treasorer.

deceased.

Edward Mortimer Earle of March departed this life in Ireland, after he had brought that land all in manner vnto peace and quietnesse, hauing gouerned it most nobly and wisely.

John Wrawe hanged.

About the feast of Saint Iohn ante port latine, all the nobles of the Realme were called to London, and other that of custome were wont to be called, although the Lent before there had been an other parliament, as before we haue shewed, in which, by the petition of the knights of the shires, Iohn Wrawe Priest, that was leader of them that did rise at Bildenhale and Bury, was adiudged to hanging and drawing, though many believed that he would haue been redeemed with money.

Earthquake.

The one and twentieth day of May was a great earthquake in England at nine of the clocke, fearing the hearts of many, but in Kent it was most vehement, where it suncke some Churches, and threwe them downe to the earth.

Hill, Aurea.

There followed also another Earthquake the xxiii. of May in the morning before the sunne rising, but not so terrible as the first. Sir Richard Scrope is depriued of the chancelorship, which he had gouerned laudably, and Robert Braybroke Bishop of London, is made Chancelor.

There arrived in a great tempest, a ship called a Caricke, at Sandwich, a huge vessell, and so fraught with riches, that she might haue furnished the want of all the land, if the enuie of the inhabitantes would haue permitted, but the marchants of London hauing much old wares, as fruits, spices, oiles, and such like, they compounded with the Genowayes to forsake that haven, and to passe ouer into Flanders, and so for the couetousnes of a few, the whole Realme sustained great hindrance.

Sir Iohn
Burghley, Sir
Simon Burghley, Sir Richard Burghley
knights.

King Richard gaue to Sir Simon Burghley his chamberlaine the keeping of his Forrest of Wolmore in Southamptonsheire, for tearme of his life: he also gaue to Iohn Burghley, Simon Burghley, Richard Burghley, knights, and Bawdwin de Radington Esquire, all the mannour of Barroke nigh to Crauesend.

Great floods.

About the Feast of Saint Thomas the Apostle, great raynes and inundations of waters chaunced, so that the water rose foure times more in height then before, drowning by Villages and Cattails, destroying Bridges and Millcs.

1382.
Bishop of Ex-wich layed in with a great

About the moneth of May, the Bishop of Exeter layed over the seas into Flanders with a great power, where he wanne the Townes of Craueling, Brugh, Dunkerke, Newport.

Whilste these things are thus doing in Flanders, the King of England and

and his Quene, with their Boheimians, visited the Abbeyes of this realme, to the which, their coming was very chargeable, for they came with an excessive number, all which came to take, but not to give.

The Scots taking occasion of the time, for that a great number were gone over with the Bishop of Norwich, entered into Northumberland, & did much hurt to the inhabitants, taking prayes in every place, and leading away the people prisoners, and carrying them into Scotland: they toke the Castell of Marke upon the river of Tweede, and bent it.

About the feast of All-Saintes, a Parliament was holden at London, in which, the halfe of a fiftene was granted unto the king by the Laptie, and shortly after the halfe of a tenth by the Cleargy, a portion of which money, the Lords of the North demaunded, because in this Parliament they were appointed to defend those parts against the irruptions of Scots, to whom answer was made by sir William Wikeham Bishop of Winchester, that they were made for that cause, of poore men, rich men and Lordes, that they might the more frankly keepe the Scots, and that the King and Lordes of the south parts should be the lesse troubled. And because the Scots came not to this Parliament, according to covenant, and beside that did displeasures unto the inhabitants of the North parts, it was decreed by this Parliament, that unto faith-breakers, faith should be broken againe, and that a chosen power should be sent thither, south of England, under the leading of Thomas of Woodstocke, to wit, a thousand lances, and two thousand archers, to restraine their attempts.

These things being knowne, the Scots being afraid of themselves, in the end of the Parliament came, and were desirous to intreat of peace or truce, but the Englishmen having tryed their fallshood so oftentimes, would neither treat, nor compound with them, but commaunded them to returne home, and warned them to save their heads as well as they might, and to defend their rights. The Scots being returned, the Lords of the North toke upon them to defend the Countrey, till Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham were ready to come with a greater power.

In this Parliament the king toke the tempozalties of the Bishop of Norwich into his hands, because he was disobedient to his commaundement when he sent to have stayed him from his journey into Flaunders, and the knights that went over with him were put in prison, till they were redeemed with gold.

The King Richard held his Christmas at his Manor of Eltham, and with him his Quene Anne.

After Christmas, Iohn Duke of Lancaster, which before Christmas went over into Fraunce to treat of peace betwixt the Realmes, returned into England, bringing with him an abstinence of warre till the feast of S. Iohn Baptist, at what time he was to returne to treat againe, and to confirme the peace if it might be agreed upon betwixt the kings.

John Duke of Lancaster went toward Scotland.

When Lent approached, John Duke of Lancaster, with his brother Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, and an innumerable number of Knights, Esquires, and Archers, went toward Scotland, but staid in the North untill all the victualles in the Countrey were consumed: he did moze hurt to the inhabitants, then the Scots had done before. At length, about the feast of Easter, he entered Scotland, but did little good.

This p̄ere master John Wickliffe, sometime student in Canterbury Colledge in the Uniuersitie of Oxfoꝝ, parson of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, haueing bene bered with a palley by the space of two p̄eres, died, on the last of December, and was buried at Lutterworth. This man whiles he liued, as also long after his death, was greatly fauoured by the students of that Uniuersity, as may appeare by letters testimoniall, made moze then twenty p̄eres after his decaie, as followeth.

To all childꝛen of our holy mother the Church, vnto whom these presents shall come, the Chancelloꝝ and company of masters of the Uniuersity of Oxfoꝝ, sendeth greting in our Loyd everlasting. Foꝝ as much as it is not decent to ouerpasse with continual silence, the acts of the valiant, noꝝ the laudes and merits of the good, but that the same should be manifested to the woꝛld by true fame foꝝ a witness of it selfe, and example of others, foꝝ that also the prudent discretion of humane nature, weying mans cruelty, hath ordained this manner of remembrance, and this buckler of defence, against the blasphemous insulting of others, that when a testimony by woꝛd cannot alwaies be ready, a penne to write may supply thereon it commeth to passe, that we haueing concciued a speciall good minde, and tender care ouer the childe sometime of our Uniuersitie, John Wickliffe professour of holy theologie, according to the deserts of his manners, do testifie with heart, woꝛd, and writing, that his conditions, while he liued, were commendable, whose honestie of manners, profunditie of iudgement, and pleasantnes of flourishing fame, we couet so much the moze to bying to the knowledge of faithfull people, as the perfection of his conuerſation, and his diligence of his writings might be the moze evidently knownen to tend to Gods gloꝝy, the weale of his neighbour, and profit of the Church, wherfoꝝ we publish vnto you by these presents, that his conuerſation ston from his tender yeres continued, til the time of his decease, hath bin here right good and honest, so as there was neuer any motion or note of sinister suspicion or infamie cast abroad of him, but in answering, reading, preaching, and soluting, hath behaved himselfe p:aise worthily, like a stout Champion of the faith, banquished by sentences of Scripture, like a Catholike man all those blasphemers of Christs religion by their wilful beggery. And therfore was not the foresaid Doctoz condemned of hereticall prauitie, or yet by our Prelates to be burnt after his burial. God defend therfore that our Prelates should haue condemned so good a man for an heretike, which in Logike, Philosophy, in Theologie, in P:opolities, and Speculatiues among all that hath written, (as we thinke) in our Uniuersitie, without yere. All which things we desire to bring to the knowledge of all and singular persons vnto whose hands these presents may come, to the intent that the said Doctozs fame may the oftner be had in remembrance. In witnesse whereof, we haue caused these our letters testimoniall to be sealed with our common seale.

Given at Oxford in our congregation house the fifth day of the moneth of October. Anno. 1406.

All this notwithstanding after ward (being excommunicated by Thomas Arundale Archbishop of Canterbury) his bones, by a Doctoz of Diuinitie of Oxfozd, named Richard Fleming Bishoppe of Lincolne, were taken vp and burnt, and the ashes thowen into the next water nere vnto Lutterworth. 41. yeres after his decease in Anno 1425. by commaundement of Pope Martine the fifth. The custody of the castle of Dover being void by the death of Robert Ashton was then appointed to Simon Burley, who was made Constable there.

After the quindene of Easter the nobles came together to a Parliament at Salisbury, whither a certain Irish Frier of the order of Carmelites, a batcheler of Diuinity named Iohn Latimer, hasted in an euill houre, for he had written a certain scedul in the which was contained many horrible practises denied (as he said) by the duke of Lancaster, for it was in that scedul expressed, that the said duke had determined sodainly to oppresse the K. and to take vpon him the kingdom, there was assigned the tyme, place & other circumstances y might make euident p:ofe of the thing. The Frier obtaining access vnto the K. presence, toke y scedule to his own hands, swearing by the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, which that day he had receiued, that al written in that scedule was true. The duke therfore being called to the K. and hauing the scedul deliuered into his hands, desired the K. that the Frier might be put in safe keeping, til the day y he should shew the cause of those things which he had proponed against him, & besought the K. that sir Io. Holland might haue special charge of him. This Io. Holland, was the K. brother by his mother, the sonne of the L. Tho. Holland, who gladly for the loue of his brother the duke did willingly accept the frer into his custody. The night before the day given to the frer to make his answer, Ioh. The morow after, they caused the friers body to be drawne throught the towne as a traitor, that they might put away all suspition, that he were put to death wrongfully: but it is to be wondred at, that neither Esquier, Yeoman, nor Crome, or any other of mean estate, would harme the frier, but the knights did it themselves, they were Iudges, Officers, and executioners, and this was the fruite of this Parliament, except that the king asked and had of the Laitie halfe a sixteenth, and of the Cleargie halfe a tenth.

Interruptions of
the Scots.
An. reg. 8.

About this time, because the Scots ceased not to do diuers damages to the Northumbers, the Earle of Northumberland Henry Percy, prepareth to invade Scotland, and to requite damage for damage, which enterprise accomplished, the Earle was no sooner returned, and sent home his army, but that the Scottes came againe, and heaped vp damage vpon damage in the countrey.

Sir John Philpot decraied.

This Sommer, sir John Philpot a most faithfull knight, and noble Citizen of London, that had a long time trauelled for the commodity of the Realme more then all other, and both with expences laid forth, & good affection borne, (for he had oftentimes relieved the king) departed this life, leauing none behind him: his like in good affections.

John Duke of
eth into France.

About the beginning of August, the Duke of Lancaster went into France to treat with the Frenchmen of peace, or els of truce to be had: the Duke with his company of noble men remaining long there, when it was thought that he should haue brought glad and ioyfull newes to his Country, hee returned with knowledge of warres, to follow the beginning of the next Sommer, the truce to endure but till the first of May, and so he returned, after he had spent 500000. Markes of Silver.

John North-hampton con-uict, and committed to perpetuall prison.

Many of the Nobles assembled at Reading, to repress the seditious stirres of John Northampton, late Maroz of London, that attempted great and heinous enterprises, of the which he was conuict, his own chaplein uttering many things that he went about and had deuised, as well to the hinderance and harme of the king, as of the Citie of London, and when sentence should haue bene pronounced agaisst him, the king being present, the wicked man made exclamation, and maintained that such iudgement ought not to passe in absence of his Lozd the Duke of Lancaster, but yet the iustice vsed such words, John (saith hee) the naughty deeds that are objected agaisst thee, thou oughtest to reuell by battell, or else by the lawes of the land to be drawne, hanged, and quartered. And when he stood mute, nor would utter one word, it was decreed that he should be committed to perpetuall prison, and his goods to be confiscated to the kings vse, and that hee should not come within one hundred miles of London during his life, hee was sent therefore to the Castle of Win-tagell in the confines of Cornwal, and in the meane space the kings seruants spoiled spoiled his goods. Iohn More, Richard Northbery, & other, were like wise there conuict, and condemned to perpetuall prison, and their goods confiscate to the king, for certaine congregations by them made against the fish-mongers in the Citty of London.

About the feast of S. Martine, a Parliament was holden at London in the which nothing was done worth y memozy, but that which stil was in hand, and erasing of money of the Clergy and common people, to maintaine the men of warre. And besides this, about the feast of Saint Andrew there was a combate fought in listes at Westminster, betwixt an Esquier of England named Iohn VVelch of Grimesby, & one of Nauarre, called Mortileto de Vilenos, that had accused the English Esquier, of treason to the King and Realme, but the effect was, that when hee was Captaine of Cherburgh, hee forced the wife of this Nauaroys, as the said Nauaroys being after ward overcome, and being ready to suffer death, did openly confesse, for the which cause, by the kings iudgement, he was drawen & hanged, although the Quene and many other did make earnest intercession to haue his life saued.

Parliament
at London.

A combate fought.

The Parliament was not yet ended, when newes came out of the North of the taking of Berwicke Castell by the Scots, the custodie whereof, the Earle of Northumberland, sir Henry Percy did possesse, by right of his predecessors. The Scots by mediation of money, got entrance into that castell, by one that was put in trust with keeping of it. The Duke of Lancaster that loued not the Earle, was glad of this happe, when he knew it. It came to passe therfore by the Dukes procurement, that the Earle was condemned by iudgement of the Lords there present, the which execution was within a short while after released. The Earle of Northumberland, thzough the kings fauour ressozed to his life and possessions, without any long delates, prepareth al furniture of warre to besiege and win the said Castell of them that were within it, and after he had gathered a mighty army, he sodainly besieged it, and after he had layne about it a certaine time, it was compounded betwixt them without, and them within, that they within should forsake the Castell, and haue their liues and moueable goods, and for surrendering the Castell, they should haue of the Earle two thousand markes of English money, and by this meanes did the Earle recover the Castell forth of the Scottishmens hands. King Richard kept a solemn feast of Christmas at Eltham with Quene Anne his wife, whom hee seldome suffered to go from his side, there were at that feast the Bohemians, the Quenes countrymen, that hauing once tasted the swætnesse of this land, forgetting their owne countrey like vnshamefast guests, would not go home againe.

Berwicke lost and wonne
againe.

Thzough certaine young men brought by with the king, there arose great dissention betwixt him and the Duke of Lancaster, who departed from the Court, and went to his Castell of Bomfret, which he had fortified, but by meanes of the kings mother, this discord was appeased for a time.

Lady Jane the kings mother died, buried at Stanfoid.

Hertfords and Denbrough burnt.

King Richard with a great armie entred Scotland, but the enemies would not shew themselves, wherefore hee burnt the Countrey and returned. The eighteenth of July there was an Earthquake. Sir Iohn de Vincenne that serued the French King was sent into Scotland with a great multitude of ships and men of warre, that topning with the Scots, they might infect all England, and that whilest they might draw the power of this Realme that way forth, the French king, with his pany and armie, might the more at liberty enter other parts of the Realme, few or none being left at home to prohibite them their entrie. The arrivall of the said Iohn being knowne in England, the king with all the nobilitie prepared themselves to make a journey thither: there came flocking vnto the king such a number of knights, Esquiers, and Archers, as the like had not bene heard of in those daies, in so much, as the number of horses amounted to thre hundred thousand, as they were iudged, Merie large the king reioyced hereat, as well he might, but the reioycing was shortly darkened at Pothe, by fiercenesse of Sir Iohn Holland, the kings brother, that sette the Lord Ralph Stafford, sonne to the Earle of Stafford, in the way as he went to the Quene, whose seruant of household he was, and greatly in fauour with her, and he was no lesse beloued of the king, as he that had bene brought vp with him, and bene his playfellow from his tender age, where the king taking great indignation, determined to pursue the said Sir Iohn Holland: hee caused therefore his goods to be confiscate. But Sir Iohn Holland fled to Wuerley, to enjoy the libertie of the Church. The Lady Jane the kings mother, sent to intreate him for her other sonne, and his brother, but when the messengers were returned to Wallingforde, and that the mother could perceiue no hope of grace to be gotten in that behalfe of the king, she toke it heauily, and fell sicke, and within foure or fise daies departed this life, her bodie being seared and closed in lead, was kept at Wallingfoid, till the kings returne forth of Scotland, then to be buried at Stanfoid, in the Church of the Friers Minoys.

In the moneth of August, the King of England with a mightie power entred Scotland, with whose force the Scots and frenchmen perceiuing themselves not able to match, they seeke to get them into the woods and places where they might be out of the way. The English armie, then the which there hath not bene seene a fairer, stronger, or greater, rideth through the Countrey, that was destitute of inhabitants, void of Castell, and wanting victuals, for the land was left desolate (as our men confessed) that they sawe not so much as a bird, owles onely excepted. They found green corne on the ground, very faire and plentifull, which they eyther cate vp with their horses, or tread downe with their feete, but the enemies fleeing battell, our men did nothing to be accounted of, but burnt the Abbey of Hertfords, and the towne of Denbrough, with such houses as they found by the way. When our armie was come to Denbrough, and that victuals failed them, many of them began to waie sicke, & some to die for hunger: wherupon the king returned ned with his arme into England. While king Richard was in Scotland, the Scots and Frenchmen entred into England, burning Townes, taking spoiles, and leading away many prisoners, returned home into their Countrey.

The souldiers of Caleis went secretly forth into Fraunce, and got a bottie of foure thousand sheepe, and three hundred head of great beasts, which they drave to their holdes.

About the feast of Saint Martine, there was a Parliament at London, in which, the Laptie granted to the king a fiftenth and a halfe, with a condition, that the Cleargie should give a tenth and a halfe. William Courtney, Archbishop of Canterbury standing there against, said, the Church ought to be free, and in no wise to be taxed by the laptie, yea, hee would rather put his head in daunger for this cause, then to suffer the English Church to be brought into such servitude: which answer he so much moved the Knights and Commons of the shires, with some of the Nobles of the Realme, that they in great rage, made request, that the temporalties might be taken from the Cleargie, and Church-men, saying, that the Church-men were growne to such pride, that it was a dede of charitie, and almes by taking away their temporalties, to compell them to be more meeke and humble: this they cried out for, this they presented in writing to the King, and such was their labour in this point, that they were in hope to bring it to passe. Here mought you have scene the Knights pleasaunt and merr, talking of these things, even as the temporalties of the Church had bene assigned to their abusing, this man promising himselfe thus much of that Monasterie, that man of an other, I heard my selfe (saith Thomas Walsingham) one of the Knightes deeply sweare, that of the Abbey of Saint Albones, hee would have a thousand markes by yere of the temporalties: But to such a mad wissh the King consented not, for hearing the inordinate crying out of the one side, and the just answeres on the other, hee commaunded that bill to be cancelled, and such inordinate petitions to cease, saying that hee would preserve the Church during his time, in as good state as hee found it, or better: with the which answer, hee so liked the Church-men, that hee was thought worthy of great recompence, and of good Lape men also this answer was much commended. The Archbishoppe therefore, having made the Cleargie private, went to the King, and declared that hee and his Cleargie of their whole consentes and free willes had prouided for his use a Tenth, which graunt the King so gladly heard, and thankfully received, that hee openly affirmed, hee had rather have this free graunt, then any other foure times double the value, that was to be constrained; and so for that time the insatiable covetousnesse of the enemies, to catch other mens goodes, was made frustrate.

Ermony came into England.

John Duke of Lancaster
king of Spayne

Henry Percy went to Caleis.

Lord Justice of Chester, he gave to him the Castell of Flint in Wales, and also he gave to him I. of Britons sonne and heire to Charles de Bloys a prisoner, for whom he had 20000. pounds. Th. of Woodstocke was made D. of Gloucester, and his brother Edmond Earle of Cambridge, Duke of Poike, Michael de la Poole Chancelloz of England, was made Earle of Suffolk, and had giuen him by the king a thousand markes by the yere. In the Parliament the Earle of March Mortimer, was proclaimed heire apparant to the Crowne, which Earle was shortly after slain in Ireland by the wilde Irish. Also, king Richard at the earnest request of the Bishops, restored to the Bishop of Poze, with his tempozalties which he had holden from him many yeres. R. Richard with Quene Anne his wife, kept their Chyristmas at Eltham, whither came to him Lion king of Ermony, vnder pretence to rezoine peace betwixt the kings of England and of Fraunce, but what his coming profited, hee onely vnderstood, for beside innumerable giftes that hee receiued of the king & of the nobles, the king lying in the Royal at the Quenes wardrop in London, granted to him a Charter of a thousand pounds by yere during his life. Hee was (as hee affirmed) chased out of his Realme by the Tartarians, and for that cause he got great giftes of the Chyistian Wynces. About the feast of Easter, John Duke of Lancaster, with the Ladie Constance his wife and a great company of Knights, Esquiers, and Archers came to take their leaue of the King and Quene, at whose departing the King gave to the Duke a crowne of gold, and the Quene gave another like crowne of golde to the Dutches, moreover the King commaunded his people to call them King and Quene of Spayne, and giue them kingly honour. And shortly after the Duke prepareth to go into Spayne, which was due to him by the inheritable right of his wife the Ladie Constance, daughter sometime to Peter King of Castile and Lion, so that now he meant to chalenge it eyther with consent of the inhabitantes, or by law of Armes. Hee with a great power toke the seas at Plimouth, and landed in Spayne, at the Hauen of Groyne, on the euen of S. Laurence, with all his fauile in safety.

Hee had with him twentie thousand chosen people, of whom was 2000. armed men, and 8000. Archers. Hee appointed for Admirall of his whole flecte, Th. Percy, sir John Holland brother to King Richard by the mothers side after created Earle of Huntington, and had married one of the Dukes daughters, was ordained Constable of the hoste, sir Richard Burghley marshall, and after him sir Tho. le Moleneaux was marshall, sir John Marmion Chamberlaine, &c.

This yere rumours were raised of the French kings purpose to besiege Caleis, many valiant men therefore were sent out of England to resist his force, among whom was sir Henry Percy, a young Gentleman, in whom the pride of all prowesse and chivalry did shine, which after hee had stayed about Caleis idely taking indignation, declared that hee hated such idlenesse, and before this, whilest he was Captaine of Berwicke, hee compelled the vniquiet Scots to be quiet, for which cause they called him Henry Hotespurre: this Henry assembling his companions, maketh invasion vpon them about

Turwine,

Corwaine, and else where in Picardie, taketh prizes, exercising laudable factes, and when he understood that the French king meant not to besiege Calais, but rather to invade England, he returnes home, that he might here encounter him.

The Londoners understanding that the French king had got together a great Ranie, assembled an armie, and set his purpose firmly to come into England, they trembling like Leuerets, feareful as Hise, scke starting holes to hide themselves in, euen as if the Citie were now to be taken, and they that in times past bragged they would blow all the Frenchmen out of England, hearing now a baine rumour of the enemies comming, they runne to the walles, bzeake downe the houses adioyning, destroy and lay them flat, and do all things in great feare, not one Frenchman yet haaiing set fote on shipbord, what would they haue done, if the battrell had bene at hand, and the weapons ouer their heads?

About the feast of S. Michaell the nobles came to the Parliament at London with great numbers of armed men, to the end they might be ready to withstand the Frenchmen, who were supposed to be comming. Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, and Chancelloz of England, caused to be called almost forth of euery part of the Realme men of armes and archers vnto the marches about London, that being ready they might beate backe the Frenchmen with their king, if they had come. Rochester brydge was beaten downe by the Londoners, to be the more surer. But being wearied with long waiting they were at the length sent home againe, with great misery for want of money to buy them victuals.

In this Parliament Iohn Fordham Bishop of Durham was discharged of the Treasurership, and in his place was set Iohn Gilbert a frier preacher, Bishop of Hereford. Also Michael de la Pole was put from his Chancellozship, and in his place was set Thomas Arundale Bishop of Ely, by consent of the whole Parliament. This being done, Michael de la Pole was charged with many crimes, & committed to prison in Windsoze Castell, from whence hee was sone deliuered by the king: all the possessions of de la Pole purchased whilest he was Chancelloz to the yerly value of 1000. pounds, were for euer by iudgement of the parliament, confiscate to the kings coffers, & further to restore to the king to the value of 12000. pounds which he had gained by lingerring his affairs, as they said. They chose also 13. Lords which should haue the ouersight vnder the R. of the whole realm. Of which thre were the new officers, to wit, the B. of Ely Chancelloz, the Bishop of Hereford Treasurer, and sir Iohn Waltham keeper of the priuy seale, and 10. other which were, VVilliam Archbishop of Canterburp, Alexander Archbishop of Yorke, Edm. Langley B. of Yorke, Thomas of Woodstocke, Duke of Gloucester, VVilliam VVickham, Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exeter, Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Richard Earle of Arundell, Iohn Lord Cobham, sir Richard Scrope, and sir 10. Curose knights, to these they gaue full power to determine causes, from the time of king Edward the third, vntill that present, as well within the Realme, as without, &c. They granted to the king a tenth of the Cleargy, and a fiftenth of the Laptie: they granted him 2 s. of every Tunne of Wine comming into the Realme, and of every pound of merchandise going out or comming in 12. d. Wool, leather, and sell, excepted.

The French
kings com-ming into England him-seld.

The French king in the meane time, staid in Flanders, ready to spoyle the Realme of England, if God had not stopped his purpose; from the first of August, till the Euen of All-Saints, there neuer blew wind for his passage, but onely for a fewe houres of that verie Euen, the wind rising, they losed anchors, hopped by sailes, and set forth of the haven, but when all the ships were on the sea 20. miles from the haven, the winde came contrary, & drove them backe, that diuers of their vessels entring the haven of Sluce were broken, by which occasion England was deliuered out of daunger, and the French king returned home. The number of his ships in that pay were reckoned 1200. Froisart saith, the ships were 1287. he had there with him of Dukes, 16. of Carles, 26. of Knights, 3600. and of fighting men, 100000. Is. Richard with his wife Quene Anne and the Bohemians as he had bene accustomed, kept his Christmas very solemnly at Westminster.

After Christmas, William Beauchampe toke 14. ships of the French king, going toward Sluce, whereof one was laden for the most part with horses, and an other with torches of ware, and such other necessaries, which the French king had prepared for his entrance into England.

About the beginning of March, according to the derra of the late Parliament, Richard Carle of Arundell, Admirall of the fleet adioyning unto him, the E. of Devonshire, & Thomas Mowbrey E. of Nottingham, went to the sea in a happy houre, for within a small time they met with their enemies on the Wiggill of our Lady the Annunciation; a great pay of Flanders, France, and Spayne, fraught with men of warre, and diuers engins, was discovered; with whom the Carles encountred, & toke of them 100. ships and more, the which contained xix. M. tuns of wine, which they brought to diuers parts of England, whereby wine was then sold for thirten shillings foure pence the tunne.

Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland forsooke his wife, a young Lady noble and faire, bozne of the Lady Isabell, daughter to the noble Is. Edward, & married an other that came with Quene Anne forth of Boheme: she was called in the bulgar tongue of her countrey Lancelona. The Lordes toke indignation herewith, especially the Duke of Gloucester, uncle to the yong Lady that was forsaken. The Duke of Ireland studied how to take the Duke of Gloucester out of the way. Easter was now past, the time in which the Duke of Ireland should haue transported into Ireland, but least there should be too much stir in the Realme among the Lordes, the king as it were to bring him to the water side, goeth with him into Wales, as not to leave him, but there to keepe him, that they might deuise how to take away the D. of Gloucester, the Carles of Arundell, Marisike, Darby, and Nottingham, with other. There were with them the Carle of Suffolk, Michael at Pole, Robert Trisilian Justice, and many other, which no more slowly then the D. of Ireland, conspired the death of the said noble men. After a great time was passed, the king, as if the Duke of Irelands journey had bene forgotten, returned with him and the other forth of Wales, to the Castell of Nottingham, there to treat of the death of the said noble men: there therfore he sent for diuers from London, whom he knew would be ready to which way soeuer they should be moued: he called thither also al the Sheriffs & Iustices of the realme, & there interdicted the Lords of many crimes which the king had imagined against them. In the mean time the rumour of this doing came to the Lords eares, whereupon first of all the kings vncke, the Duke of Gloucester, that he might mitigate the kings displeasure, before the Bishop of London, and many other nobles, swearing vpon the Euangelists, toke it vpon his oath, that he neuer had imagined any thing to the kings hinderance, or done any thing to his displeasure, except that he had not giuen good countenance to the Duke of Ireland, nor would hereafter giue him any, who had dishonested his kinswoman, the which he firmly had determined to reuenge.

The Duke of Gloucester calling together secretly the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, and Darby, that were in like danger of condemnation, if they promised not the more speedily, he discovered to them the matter: they therfore gathered their armies together, determine to talke with the king vpon the premises. Contrarily the king for his party did deliberate how he might take each of them by themselves out of the way, and first he sent to the Castell of Rigate, where the Earle of Arundell lay, the Earle of Northumberland with many other to arrest him, who perceiuing a great number of men of warre about him, fearing to doe that he was commaunded, departed without doing his errand for which he came. After whom, there were sent many that by night should haue taken him, or haue slaine him, but a messenger sent from the Duke of Gloucester, preuented their comming, that caused him to ride all night, so that in the morning he was come to Haringey, hauing passed with his army thirtie miles, not without great trauaile, where he found assembled the Duke of Gloucester & the Earle of Warwicke, with a great power of men. The king being enformed of this assembly in Harnesey woode, as is said, demanded of his familiars what was to be done in this case, but in the ende, by the mediation of them that came betwixt them, the matter was brought to this issue, that the Lords should come to Westminster to receiue answer before the king of those things, the bishop of Ely, with many other men of worthy credite, taking an oath for the kings part, that no fraud, deceit, or perill, should be prepared. When the Lords had prepared themselves according to the couenant, the foresaid mediators for peace sent them word, that treason was deuised by an ambush laid for them, in a place called the Hewes, nere to Charing Crosse, and therfore willed them not to come, but with sure hand, whereupon they stayed there: and the king demanding why the Lords kept not couenant, the Bishop of Ely answered, because (saith he) there is an ambush laid of a thousand armed men or more, in such a place, contrary to the couenant, and therfore they neither come, nor repute you to be faithfull: the king moued south with, sware he knew of no such thing, and therfore commaunded the Sheriffes of London, that going to the Peiwees, they should kill, if they found any assembled there for that cause; but Thomas Triuer, and Nicholas Brembar knights, had secretly sent away the armed men to London: the king therfore sent again to the Lords, who straightwaies came to Westminster with a strong power, against whose coming, the king adorning himselfe with kingly robes, with crowne and scepter, entred Westminster hall, where the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancelor, speaking for the king, demanded the cause of their assembling of such a power, wherunto the Lords answered, that it was done for the kings profit, and the realmes, to plucke from him the traittors which he kept about him, whom they named to be Robert de Vere D. of Ireland, Alexander Neuell Archbishop of Dozke, Michaell at Pole Earle of Suffolke, Robert Trisilian a false Justice, Nicholas Brembar a false knight of London, and therrupon they threw downe their gloues, swearing that they would prosecute it by battell: nay, saith the king, it shall not be so, but in the next parliament which was appointed to be holden the morrow after the purification of our Ladie, all this was pacified for that time.

Strange like-

ster.

A manner of exhalation in likeness of fire, appeared in the night in many places of England, which went with men as they went, and stayed as they did, sometime like a whole, sometime like a barrell, sometime like a timber-logge, but when many went together, it appeared to be farre off.

Battell at Radcot bridge

The Lords departing from the king notwithstanding kept together, which seemed great wisdom in them, for the Duke of Ireland in the parts of Chester & Wales, had assembled a great number, whose Captaine was the Constable of Chester, Thomas Moleneux, a man of great wealth, and hardy. The Duke of Ireland with such a multitude hastened towards London, that joining with the Londoners, he might make them both as it were an invincible army. But the Duke of Ireland riding forth in statelie and glorious array with the army of 5000. men, thinking none durst haue encountered him: neuertheless in the vigill of S. Thomas the Apostle, when he came to Radcot bridge in Oxfordshire nere unto Farendon vpon Thames, not past foure miles from Cheping Porton, which bridge, if he could haue passed, he had bene out of danger, sodainly, as he looked on the one side, he beheld where the host of the Lords was ready not farre from them carrying his coming, in the midst of the valley, with which sight his heart straightwaies failed: and he said, friend I must fly, for a greater puissance seemeth to be ponder against you they haue no quarrell, so that I being shifted away, ye shall escape wel enough, and so forth with setting spurres to his horse, he fled away. There was then the foresaid Thomas Moleneux that prepared himselfe to the battell, for the Lordes were not yet all come to that place, who when he had fought a while, being wearied, entred the river which was there by. Among other, sir Thomas Mortimer knight exhorted him to come vp, or else he would shote him through in the river: if I doe come vp saith Thomas Moleneux, wilt thou saue my life? I doe make no such promise (saith he) but eyther come vp, or then shalt straight die for it. To whom he answered, suffer me to come vp and let me fight eyther with thee or some other, and die like a man. As he came vp, the knight caught caught him by the helmet, and plucked it off his head, and straight waies with his dagger strucke him into the braines.

The Duke of Ireland fleeing, came to the river of Chamis, and forced his horse to enter, in the which being made of an horseman a swimmer, he got to the other side: his horse, helmet, gantlets and breast-plate came to the share of the Lords, so that he was thought long after to be drowned, but he got o<sup>u</sup>er into Flaunders.

The Archbishop of Yorke fled, and Robert Trisilian, and Michael de la Poole got him to Caleis. The Lords being returned from the battell, which had bene néere to Burford, fast by Wablack, made great ioy for the ouerthrow of their enemies, but much lamented the escape of the Duke of Ireland.

A head of earth was made at Orford by Art of Necromancie, that at a time appointed spake these words, Caput decidetur, The head shall be cut off: Caput eleuabitur, The head shall be lift vp: Pedes eleuabuntur supra caput, The feete shall be lift aboue the head.

Dissention fell at Orford betwéene the Southerne and Welchmen, on the one part, and Northerne Schollers on the other, where-though many were slaine, and the more part went to their countries, wherefore the Chancelloz was deputed, and Doctor Nicholas Brightwell Deane of Newarke in Leice<sup>ster</sup> was made Chancelloz.

The Lords hasted to London, where the king kept his Chyristmasse in the Tower of London, they hauing assembled an armie of néere hand forth thousand the morrow after Chyristmasse day came to London, and mustred in the fieldes, where they might be séene of them in the Tower: the Londoners were then in great feare, weping diuers perilles as the kings displeasure, if they opened their gates to the Lords, and if they shut them forth, the indignation of the vndiscrete multitude.

The Duke of Gloucester with other entred the Tower, and hauing a little talke with the King, they rected the conspiracie, where by they had bene indicted, and they shewed forth also the letters, which he had sent vnto the Duke of Ireland, that he should assemble an armie to their destruction, &c. in the end the king promised on the next morrow to come to Westminster, and there to intreat at large for reformation of all matters.

In the morning the king came to Westminster, where, after a little talke, the nobles said that for his honour and commoditie of his kingdome it was behouefull, that the traitors, whisperers, flatterers, and vnprofitable people were remoued out of place, and that others might be placed in their comes.

The king, although sore against his mind, when he saw how y<sup>e</sup> Lords were bent, and that he wanted power to withstand them, condescended to do what they would haue him, & to conclude, the king at the request of the Lords commaunded the suspected persons of his court, & family to be awarded to prison, to answer at the next Parliament, which persons were sir Simon Burghley, sir William Elmham, sir Nicholas Dagworth, sir Iohn Golefare, which was not yet returned out of Fraunce, all these being knights, Richard Clifford, and a

To the Castell of Rochester was appointed Alexander Neuell Archbishop of Porke, but he was escaped as ye haue heard, and Michaell de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, which was fled. To the Castell of Gloucester were deputed Robert Trisilian chiefe Justice of England, which was not yet found, and Nicholas Brembar, who found sureties to stand to the lawes of the Realme.

These were remoued also from the Court, but not sent to prison, John Fordham Bishop of Durham, the Lord Beament, Lord William de la Souch of Harneworth, the Lord Burnell, sir John Louell, the Lord Thomas Camoys, Thomas the sonne of the Lord Clifford, with Baldwin Burforde, Thomas Rushoke a frier, Withoppe of Chichester the kings Confessour, Aubery de Vere, Richard Aberbery, John VVorth, the Ladie Maine, the Ladie Paines, and the Ladie Molineaux, all which were to answere at the next Parliament.

Parliament
that wrought wonders.

The third day of Februarie, the Parliament began at Westminster, which Parliament continued till the 13. of June next following, except from the Vigill of Palmesonday untill the Octaues of Easter, this Parliament was named the Parliament that wrought wonders. The Lords came to this Parliament with a sufficient army for their owne sureties. The first day of this Parliament were arrested as they sat in their places, all the Justices, except sir VVilliam Skipwith, and sir Roger Fulchorpe, sir Robert Belknappe, sir John Carey, sir John Holte, sir VVilliam Borow, and John Alecston the kinges Serieant at Lawe, all these were sent to the Tower, and there kept in severall places.

The cause was, for that where in the last Parliament diuers Lords were made gouernours of the Realme, both by assent of the Parliament, and also by the aduice and counsel of all the Justices, and yet notwithstanding, the said Justices in a counsel holden at Pottingham, did the contrary, whereupon it was now determin'd that they should make answere to their doings. Whereouer, in the beginning of this Parliament were openly called, Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuell Archbishop of Porke, Michaell de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, sir Robert Trisilian Lord chiefe Justice of England, & Nicholas Brembar, whom the king had oft times made Maior of London against the minde of the Citizens, to answere befoze Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earle of Arundell, Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwick, Henry Earle of Darby, & Thomas Earle of Pottingham, vpon certain articles of high treason, which these Lords did charge them with: and sozasmuch as none of the appeared, it was ordained by the whole assent of the Parliament, that they should be banished for euer, and their lands and goods to be forfeited and seized into the kings hands, their landes entailed excepted, which should descend to their heires. The proccesse against those five Lords

compysed in eight and thirtie articles, I ouerpatte in this place, and haue set them downe in my larger Chronicle.

The foresaid Lordes being fled as is aforesaid, Robert Trisilian a Cozynthman, Lord chiefe Iustice to the King, had hid himself in an Apothecaries house in the Sanctuary nere to the gate of Westminster, where he might see the Lordes going to the Parliament, and comming forth thereby to learne what was done, for all his life time he did all things closely, but now his craft being espied was turned to great folly. For on Wednesday the seuenteenth of February he was betrayed of his owne seruant, & about eleuen of the clocke before none, being taken by the Duke of Gloucester, and in the Parliament presented, so that the same day in the after none hee was drawen to Tyborne from the Tower of London throughe the Citie, and there had his throat cut, and his bodie was buried in the gray Friers Church at London. This man had disfigured himselfe, as if he had bene a poore weake man, in a strize coat, all old and tozney, and had artificially made himselfe a long beard, such as they called a Paris beard, and had defiled his face, to the end he might not be knownen but by his speach. On the morrow, was executed sir Nicholas Brembar, who had done many oppzessions, and caused seditions in the Citie, of whom it was said, that whilst he was in full authoritie of Maioralitie, he caused a common payre of Stocks in euery ward, and a common Are to be made to behead all such as should be against him, and it was further said, that hee had indited 8000. and moze of the best and greatest of the Citie, but it was said that the said Nicholas was beheaded with the same Are he had prepared for other: this man if hee had liued, had bene created Duke of Troy, or of London by the name of Troy.

On the fourth of March Thomas Vske, Undershyue of London, and Iohn Blake Esquire, one of the kings household, were drawne from the Tower to Tyborne and there hanged and beheaded, the head of Thomas Vske was set vp ouer Newgate, to the opprobry of his parents, which inhabited thereby. The goods of the Bishop of Chichester were confiscate, and on the eleuenth of March the Parliament was prorooged vnto the quinden of Pasch.

The fift day of May sir Simon Burghley Constable of Dover, and Chamberlaine to the King, an intollerable proud man and a great oppzessor of the poore, &c. was condemned of treason, but the King dispensed for his drawing and hanging, so that he was with his hands bound behinde him led throughe the Citie of London, and had his head stricken off vpon the Tower hill on the fiftenth day of May, his heires were by Henry the fourth restored in blood and inheritance, except the landes giuen to the new Abbey on the Tower hill, to S. Stephens at Westminster, and to the Friers at Langley. This man might by inheritance dispend twentie markes by yere, but in few yeres he so grew in seruice of the king, that he attained to the value of 3000. markes of yereleu revenues, of whom it was said that he gave at Christmasse for liveries of knights and Esquires, yeomen and others as well of the kings court as of his owne family, sometime fortye clothes, sometime 160. clothes, and sometime 20. of great price, as of Scarlet, &c.

Also on the twelfth of May Iohn Beauchampe of Holt Lord Steward of the kings house, whom the king had thought to haue made Baron of Bzidge, north, was condemned to be drawne, and hanged, but by the kings fauour, he lost his head on the Tower hill.

Sir Iohn Bernes knight of the kings Court, a lustie young man, was in the same place beheaded. Sir Iohn Salisburie knight was drawne from the Tower to Otbozne, and there hanged.

There were condemned also in the same Parliament these Iustices, sir Ro. Belknappe, sir Iohn Carre, sir Iohn Holte, sir Roger Fulthorpe, and sir VVilliam Brough, Iohn Locton Serieant at the Lawe, Richard Gray Iustices, with the Lords befoze fled, were all banished.

There was granted to the king, of the Cleargie halfe a tenth, and of the Laity halfe a sixteenth, and of the merchants twelue pence of the pound, three shillings of the tunne, three and fifty shillings foure pence of the sacke of wool. The Duke of Gloucester, and sir Iohn Cobham, asked pardon of the Abbot of Westminster for violence done in the sanctuarie of Westminster, in the taking of the Iustice Trisilian. The last saue one of May there were deliuered out of the Tower VV. Elmham, T. Triuer, and Nicholas Dagworth knights. Also the first of Iune, Iohn Holland the kings brother was created Earle of Huntington.

A Dolphin of the Sea, came up to London Bridge.

King Richard with Quene Anne his wife, foure Bishops, as many Carles, the Duke of York, many Lords, and fiftene Ladies, held a royall Christmasse at Langley nere to S. Albons. The same Christmas day a Dolphin came forth of the Sea and played himselfe in the Thames at London, to the Bridge, forshelwing happily the tempests that were to follow within a weeke after, the which Dolphin being scene of the Citizens, and followed, was with much difficulty intercepted, & brought againe to London, the wing a spectacle to many, of the height of his body, for he was tenne fote in length. These Dolphins are fishes of the sea, that follow the voices of men, and reioyce in playing of instruments, & are wont to gather themselves at musicke. These when they play in riuers, with hasty springings or leapinges doe signifie Tempest to follow. The seas containe nothing moze swift nor nimble, for oftentimes with their skips, they mount ouer the sailes of ships.

T. Wallingham.

The King sent to the Londoners requesting to borrow of them one thousand pound, which they stoutly denied, and also euill entreated, beate and nether hand slew a certaine Lumbard that would haue lent the King the said summe, which when the King heard, he was maruellously angried, and calling together almost all the Nobles of the land to Stamford on the fine and twentieth day of May, he opened to them the malitiousnesse of the Londoners, and complained of their presumption, the which noble men gaue counsell, that their insolencie should with speede be repressed, and their pride abated. By the Kings iudgement therefore was the Maior of London and the Sheriffs, with other the best Citizens arrested to appeare at Bottingham, where on the eleuenth of June, Iohn Hinde Maior was deposed, and sent to Windsor Castle, the Sheriffes were also deposed, and sent the one to the Castle of Wallingford, the other to the Castle of Odham, and the other Citizens to other prisons till the King with his Councell had determined what should be done with them. And there it was determined, that from thenceforth the Londoners should should not chouse nor haue any Maior, but that the King should appoint one of his Knights to be ruler of the Citie: their priuiledges were reuoked, their liberties disanulled, and their lawes abrogated.

The King then on the one and twentieth of June first appoynted to be Warden of the Citie a certaine Knight called Sir Edward de Dalingrige, but he was quickly depozed by the King, because men said he fauoured the Londoners, and Baldwin Radinton was constituted in his place.

An. reg. 16.

In the meane time, through suite of certaine Knights, but specially of the Duke of Glocester, the King is somewhat pacified, and by little and little abateth the rigour of his purpose, calling to minde the diuers honours, and the great giftes he had receiued of the Londoners, whereupon he determineth to deale more mildely with them, and to call them to some hope of grace and pardon, he sendeth commandement to them to come to Windsor, there to shewe their priuiledges, liberties and lawes, which being there shewed some of them were ratified and some condemned, but they could not obtaine the Kings full fauour, till they had satisfied the King for the iniuries which was said they had done. The King at this assembly at Windsor, had got together almost all the Lords, and so great an armie, that the Londoners had cause to be afraid thereof, about the which preparation he was at great charges, for the which it was sure that the Londoners must pay. They therefore not ignorant that the end of these things was a money matter, submitted themselves to the Kings pleasure, offering tenne thousand pound. They were yet dismissed home to returne againe, vncertaine what satisfaction and summe they should pay.

When the Citizens were returned, and that the Nobles and other were gone home: the King hearing that the Londoners were in heauines, and dismayed, he said to his men, I will goe (saith he) to London, and comfort the Citizens, and will not that they any longer despaire of my fauour, which sentence was no sooner known in the Citie but all men were filled with incredible ioy, so that euery of them generally determined to meete him, and to be as liberall in gifts, as they were at his coronation. The King therefore as he came from Shire in Surrey to London, with Quene Anne his wife, on the 29. of August, the principall Citizens all in one liuery to the number of 400. horsemen rode to meete them at Wandsworth, where in most lowly wise, they submitted themselves vnto his grace, beseeching him of his speciall pardon, in all such things, as they before had offended him, and the Recorder of the Citie, in the name of the whole Citizens, instantly required him, that he would of his great bounty take such paine vpon him as to ride through his Chamber of London, to the which request he graciously consented, so he held on his iourney til he came to S. Georges Church in Southwarke, where they were receiued with procession of Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London, and all the Clergie of the Citie, who conueyed them through London, the Citizens of London, men, women and childzen in order meeting the King at London Bridge, where he was by them presented with two faire white stables, trapped in cloth of golde, parted of red and white, hanged full of siluer belles, the which which present he thankfully receiued, and after he held on his way through the Citie toward Westminster.

And as they passed the Citie the streets were hanged with cloth of golde, siluer and like. The Conduite in Chepe ran with red and white Wine, and by a childe Angel-like he was presented with a very costly crowne of golde, and the Quene with another. A table of the Trinitie in golde was giuen to the king, valued worth eight hundred pound, and another to the Quene of S. Anne, because her name was Anne, with diuers other gifts, as boxes, trappers, plate of gold and siluer, clothes of gold, like, beluets, Basons & Cewers of golde, also golde in coyne, precious stones, and iewels, so rich, excellent, and beautifull, that the value and price might not wel be esteemed, and so the Citizens recouered their ancient customes and liberties, & then the Kings Bench from Poike, and the Chancery from Pottingham, was returned to London. And it was graunted to them that they might chosse them a Mayor as befoze time they had done. The Londoners beleued that by these gifts they had escaped all daunger, and that from thenceforth they should be quiet, but they were deceiued, for they were compelled to giue the King after this 10000. pound, collected of the commons in great bitterness of minde; for the which summe, the King became beneuolent to the Citizens, and forgane them all trespasses, by his patents dated at Westminster the 28. of February, and so the troubles of the Citizens came to quietnesse; which trouble the Dolphin in Thamis at Christmasse last past did happily signifie a farre off. A fabulous booke compiled by a namelesse authoz, but printed by William Caxton (and therefore called Caxtons Chronicle) reporteth these troubles to happen through a fray in Flotestrate, about an horse loose which was taken out of a Bakers basket, by a Peoman of the Bishop of Salisburies, and that the same troubles were pacified, and their liberties were againe restored by meanes of Richard Grauesend Bishop of London, in reward whereof the Citizens repaire to the place of burial in the middle Isle of S. Pauls church, &c. But al is vntue, for at this time Robert Braybroke was Bishop of London, and Richard Grauesend had been Bishop, and deceased in the time of Edward the first, in Anno 1303. almost 90. yeres befoze this time. After whom succeeded in the Bishopricke Ralph Baldoke, Gilbert Segraue, Richard Newport, Steuen Grauesend, Richard Wentworth, Ralph Stratford, Michael Norbroke, Simon Sudbury, William Courtney, and Robert Braybrooke that late Bishop of London from 1381. untill the yere 1403.

Whoeuer the place of buriall in S. Pauls, whereunto the Mayor and Citizens of London haue repayed, is of William, who was Bishop of London in the time of William Conquerour, who purchased the first Charter of the said King William, for the same Citie, as I haue befoze declared.

Certaine Lords of Scotland came into England to get worship by force of armes. The Earle of Marre challenged the Earle of Nottingham, to iust with him, and so they rode together certaine courses, but not the full challenge, for the Earle of Marre was cast both horse and man, and two of his ribbes broken with the fall, so that he was bozne out of Smithfield, and conueyed toward Scotland, but died by the way at Pozke. and death.*

Also this yere deceased that famous Knight, knowne to the world, Sir John Hawkwood, whose deedes (saith Thomas Walsingham) require a speciall treatise. I finde by good record, that this John Hawkwood was bozne in Essex in the parish of Wingham Stibel, the sonne of Gilbert de Hawkwood Tanner, in his youth he was bound as an apprentice with a Taylor in the citie of London, and from thence was prest in the musters for seruice of King Edward the third in the warres of France, wherein he serued first as a common souldier in the rowme of an Archer. Afterward he was made a captaine and had some charge committed vnto him, which he so well performed, as he was aduanced to the order of knight hood, and stood in good possibilitie to haue growne to great preferment by those warres if they had indured: for when the peace was concluded at Brytaine, beside Chartiers in the yere of Christ 1360. he was then a pwee knight, and had reaped small commoditie of those warres. Wherefore he ioyned himselfe with the companies, called the late commers, who assembled in great numbers, a five or six thousand English hoesemen, and seeking after better gaine, made great spoyle of all the East parts of the kingdom of France, passing through Champaine, Burgondy, and Damphin, vnto the very gates of Auignion in Prouence, where Clement the seuenth, Bishop of Rome, then held his residence and court of Cardinales: from whence hee departed into Lombardy, hauing the leading of that part of the companies companies, which was called the white bande, with whom he serued valiantly in the warres of Iohn Marques of Mountferrato. But when Leonel Duke of Clarence sonne to Edward the 3. King of England came into Italy, to marry the Lady Violent, daughter of Galeasius, Viscount Lord of Millaine, he sought that seruice and attended the Duke to that marriage.

At which time Barnabe the brother of Galeasius had great warres with the territorye of the state of Mantua, and obtained of the Duke of Clarence, that Sir Iohn Hawkwood being a Captaine, and principall man of his retinue might come to ayde him in his warres, for Barnabe being himselfe a warlike Prince, had a great desire to make some triall of the discipline and prowesse of the Englishmen. Sir Iohn Hawkwood therefore hauing in sundry skirmishes with great courage, and consideration happily taken aduantageable occasions of victorie, and the Englishmen demeaning themselves worthily with their bowes and arrowes, did drawe Barnabe into that admiration of them, that he commended the discipline of this nation, and greatly regarded the prowes and discretion of Sir Iohn Hawkwood. And in short time after, to wit, the first yere of King Richard, good liking increasing betwene them by entercourse of fauours and courtesies, he desired to haue him his sonne in laue, and gaue him in marriage the Lady Domnia his daughter, whom he had begotten of a noble woman, named Porra, with the valour of tenne thousand Florenes of yereley reueneue, and after that time he married not any other.

This alliance being made in respect of his valour in warre, was the occasion of the increase both of his pay, and of the renowne of the Englishmen throughout all Italie: That a most puissant Prince in warre, had not without sufficient cause to induce him, conceived so good opinion of the valour of a man that was a stranger, and for this cause his seruice was required by the Princes and free Cities of Italy. For at that time all martiall affaires amongst the Italians were managed by forraine forces and Capitaines.

It fortuned that vpon some displeasure conceived the Englishmen that were left at Alba where the Duke of Clarence dyed, for the alliance past, made a sodaine reuolt from the friendshipde of Galeasius, and Barnabe, and toynded themselues with their enemies, by which change of affections many of the Townes of Lombardy came to be wasted, by the outrageous spoiles of the Englishmen, amongst other they toke the Towne of Faera, and Banacanallo, whereof he solde one to the Marques of Cast for twentie thousand Crownes, and the other he kept, and after that Sir Iohn Hawkwood, hauing both his forces and pay increased, determined to seeke newe hopes, and newe aduentures. He went first to the ayde of Pope Gregorie the twelfth, and hauing with great commendation recovered the Cities of Prouence that had reuolted from him, for his seruice therein was worthily rewarded with the dominion of siue Townes. From him, he went to the Florentines, who profered great pay, and from them, not long after to the Visances, and then againe to the Florentines, vnder whome he serued with such a number of our nation both hoyle men and sote men that all Italie feared him, with that successe and increafe of his commendation, and glorious renoume, that hee was easily reputed to be the best Souldiour of that age, for hee had learned by his long experience in the warres, hauing an excèding ripe and quicke conceipt, to foze occasions, to frame his resolutions, and to make speedie execution, being also as occasion required, both hot in his sight, and notable for his delayes, in so much as sundry great Captaines, who were afterward highly renowned, proceeded out of his Schoole, as from an exact Master of Partiall affaires. The exploytes that he had atchieued, with good successe, were accounted for sure groundes and principles of Discipline, as well amongst his very enemies, as also amongst his owne followers.

After infinite victozies obtained, and an incomparable renoume amongst all men for the same, he deceased at Flozence being then an olde man, and was most honourably buried in the great Church of the same Citie, where after his death, the Senate in rewarde of his good deseruing, bestowed vpon him the honour of a Tombe, with the Image of a man on horsebacke, as great as a mightie Pillar, for a Monument and testimonie of his great prowesse in warre, and excèding fidelitie to their state. Notwithstanding his executours, or other wise his friendes here in England, to wit, Robert Rokeden senior, Robert Rokeden iunior, and Iohn Coe, raysed a Monument, or Tombe arched ouer, and ingrauen to the likenesse of Haukes lying in a woode, in the Parish Church of Wyngham-sible where he was bozne, and founded there for him a Chantry, and another in the Priory of Wyngham Castle, to remember Iohn Haukewood Knight, Iohn Oliuer, and Thomas Newenton Esquires.

Irish people to auoid England.

About the moneth of August Proclamation was made that all Irish people should anoyde the Realme, and get them home befoze the feast of the natiuitie of our Lady, vpon paine of life.

King Richard
went into Ireland.

King Richard went ouer into Ireland, and the Duke of Gloucester with him, and the Carles of March, Salisburie, Arundell, Nottingham and Rutland. The Irishmen being afraid of such preparation as was made, durst not shew themselves openly, but with secret assaultings they often troubled the Kings army, yet when the Englishmen preuailed, many of the Lords of the land submitted themselves to the king, of which some the king held with him, least they should attempt some new stirre.

London.

The king held his Chyristmasse at Dublin in Ireland, and after that feast held a Parliament there: also the same time the Duke of Poike, the Lord Warden of England called a Parliament at London, to the which came (being sent forth of Ireland) the Duke of Gloucester, the which befoze all the States shewed the Kings neede, who had now spent his treasure amongst the Irishmen, so that a tenth was granted by the Clergie, and a fiftieth by the Lapy.

The same time the fauourers of Wikcliffes opinions, set vp on the gates of S. Pauls Church in London, and on the gates of Saint Peters Church at Westminster, Westminster, vehement accusations of the Cleargie, and conclusions such as had not been heard of, among the which were these verses following.

Plangunt Anglorum gentes crimen Sodomorum,

Paulus fert, horum sunt idola causa malorum.

Surgunt ingrati, corrupto semine nati,

Mentum praelati, hoc defensare parati,

Qui Reges estis, populi quicunque praestis,

the Cleargie.

They were mainteyned in this their doing, by some noble men & knights of this land, among which as chiefe were Sir Richard Scury, Sir Lewes de Clifford, Sir Thomas Larimer, Sir Iohn Mountague, which did instigate them to confound if they might, the religious men: whereupon the Archbishop of Poike, the Bishop of London and other, as messengers from the whole state of the cleargie passed ouer into Ireland, where to the King they made a grievous complaint, beseeching him that he would returne with speede, to helpe the faith and Church that was now incredibly afflicted by lollardes, (as they termed them) how they might take away all the possessions of the Church, and that worse was, how they might take and destroy all Canonically foundations. King Richard hearing these things, determined to returne home the sooner. And when he was returned, he called befoze him, and rebuked certayne of the Nobles bitterly, threatening them, if they from thenceforth favoured these Lollards, or in any wise did comfort them he would extreamely punish them, he toke an othe of Sir Richard Scury, that from thence forth, he should not hold such opinions, which thing being done, the king said, and I sweare to thee that if thou ever violate thine othe, thou shalt die a shamefull death, other hearing such roaring of the Lion, plucked in their heads and lay close.

About this time Sir Iohn Froisart Chanon of Chimay in the Carle dome of Heynault, as himselfe reporteth, came into England, he demaunded of Sir William Lille (who had been with the King in Ireland) the manner of the hole that in Ireland is called Saint Patrikes Purgatory, if it were true that was said of it, or not: who answered, that such a hole there was, and that himselfe and another knight had been there while the King lay at Dublin, & said they entred into the hole, and were closed in at the sunne set, and abode there all the night, and the next morning issued out againe at the sunne rising: he said, that when he & his fellow were entred and past the gate that was called the Purgatory of Saint Patrike, and that they were descended and gone downe thre or foure pases, as into a cellar, a certayne hote vapour rose against them, and strake so into their heads, that they were faine to sit downe on y<sup>e</sup> staires which were of stone: and after they had sate there a season, they had great desire to sleepe, and so fell into a slumber, and slept there all night. In the which sleepe they had marvellous dreames, other wise then they were wont to haue in their chambers: but in the morning after they had issued out, they had cleane forgotten their dreames and visions.

King Richard sent messengers the Earle of Rutland, the Earle Marshall, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Ely, Lewes Clifford, Henry Beaumont, Hugh Spencer, and many other to Charles the French King, to treat with him for a marriage to be had betwene the King of England, and the French Kings eldest daughter named Isabell of eight yeeres old, who was already promised to the Duke of Britons sonne, by a treaty that was made at Loures in Thouraine. This was hard to be broken, for the French King and his vncles had sealed with the Duke of Britaine.

Now somewhat of the former voiage of King Richard into Ireland, as the same was reported to Sir Iohn Froilart, by an Equire of England, named Henry Chritall. Sir Iohn (quoth he) it is not in memorie, that euer any King of England made such prouision for any iourney into Ireland, nor such a number of men of armes, nor archers. The King was a nine moneths in the marches of Ireland to his great cost, and charge to the realme, for they bare all his expenses: and the merchant-cities, and good towne of the Realme thought it well bestowled, when they sawe the King returne home againe with honour. The number that he had thither, were four thousand men of armes, and thirtie thousand archers, well payed weekly. But to shew the truth, Ireland is one of the euil Countries of the world to make warre vpon, or to bring vnder subiection, for it is closed strongly and wilde with high forests, & great waters and marshes. It is hard to enter to doe them of the Countrey any damage: nor ye shall finde no towne, nor person to speake withall. For the men dwel to the woodes, and dwell in Caves or small Cottages, vnder trees and among bushes, like wilde and sauage beasts: and when they knowe that any man maketh warre against them, being entred into their Countries, then they draw together to the straites and passages to defend them, so that no man can enter into them. And when they see their time, they will some take their aduantage on their enemies, for they knowe the countrey, and are light people. For a man of armes, being neuer so well horsed, and runne he neuer so fast, the Irishmen will runne on fote as fast as he, and ouertake him, yea, and leape vpon his horse behinde him, and throwe him from his horse: for they are strong men in their armes, and haue sharpe weapons with large blades, two edged, wherewith they will slay their enemy, whom they neuer repute to be dead till they haue cut his throte, and opened his belly, and taken out his heart, which they carry away with them, some say they eate it, and haue great delight therein, they take no man to ransom. And when they see that they be ouermatched, then they will depart and hide themselves in bushes, woods, and caves, so that no man shall finde them: Sir William Windfore, who had most vsed the warres in those parts of any other Englishman, could neuer learne the manner of the Countrey. They be hard people, and of rude witte: and they set nothing by tollitte, nor fresh apparell, nor by noblenesse, for though their Countrey be soveraignly governed by Kings, whereof they haue many, yet will they abide and continue in their rudenesse.

Truth it is, that foure of the principall Kings, and most puissant after the manner of the country, are come to the obeyesance of the King of England, by loue and faire meanes, and not by battell, or constraint. The Earle of Ormond, mond, who marcheth vpon them, hath taken great paine, and hath so luted them, that they came to Dublin to the King, and submitted them to him, to be vnder the obedience of the Crowne of England, wherefore the King and all the Realme reputeth this for a great and honourable acte. For King Edward did neuer so much vpon them, as King Richard did in his voyage. The honour is great, but the profit is but small, &c. The names of the foure Kings were these, first, the great Oneale King of Meth, the second Brine of Thomond King of Thomond, the third Arthure of Mackquemur King of Leinster, the fourth Conlne King of Cheueno and Drape, they were made knights by King Richard in the Cathedrall Church of Dublin: these foure Kings watched all the night before in the Church, and the next day at high Masse time, were made knights, and with them Sir Thomas Orpew, Sir James Pado, and Sir Iohn Pado his cousin.

These Kings sate that day at the Table with King Richard, they were regarded of many people, because their behaviour was straunge to the manner of England.

When Sir Iohn Froisart desired to knowe howe it came to passe, that foure Kings of Ireland were so soone brought to the obedience of King Richard, when King Edward the Kings grandfather, who was so valiant a Prince could neuer subdue them: Sir Henry Cristal answered, he could not tell, but as men said, the great puissance that the King had ouer with him, and remaining there nine moneths, abashed the Irishmen. Also the Sea was closed from them on all parts, whereby their merchandises might not enter into their Countries, though they that dwell farre within the Realme cared little for it, yet such as lue on the marches of England and by the Sea coast, vse feate of merchandise.

King Edward in his time, had to answer so many warres in France, Britaine, Gascoigne, and Scotland, that his people were diuided in diuers places, wherefore, he could not send any great number into Ireland. But when the Irishmen sawe the great number of men of warre that King Richard had in this last iourney, they aduised themselves, and came to obedience.

Howeuer there was of olde time in England a King named Edward, who is canonized as a Saint: This King in his time subdued the Danes, and discomfited them by battell on the sea thre times: This Edward the Irishmen loved, and dyed him much more then any King of England that had been before. And therefore King Richard this yere past, when he was in Ireland, in all his armoyes and deuises, he left the bearing of the armes of England, as the Leopardes and floure deluces, and bare the armes of Saint Edward, that is, a crosse patent golde and gules, with foure white Parteleys in the field, whereof it was said, the Irishmen were well pleased, and the soner inclined to him, and haue done to him faith and homage in like manner as their Predecessours sometime did to King Edward. Thus haue I shewed the manner howe King Richard had this yere accomplished his voyage in Ireland.

Edward the Confessor his armes foure Parteleys.

In this meane space the English Lords rid from Caleis to Amiens, and to Claremount in Beaufayn, and so to Paris, where they were lodged about the Crosse of Tyrener, they were five hundred horses. The French King was lodged at the Castle of Louvre, and the Quene with her children at the house of S. Paul upon the river Saine. The Duke of Berrey at the house of Bessle, the Duke of Burgoine at the house of Arthois, and the Duke of Bourbon in his owne house, the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of S. Paul, and the Lord Cowsey at their owne houses.

The King had assembled there all his Councell, to the intent to make the better answer to the Embassadours of England. He commanded every day to be deliuered to these Embassadoys 200. Crownes, for their smaler pences, and for their horses. And the chiefe, as the Earle Marshall, and the Earle of Kentland, were oftentimes with the king and dined with him. These Lords desired euer to haue answer, and hauing been at Paris. 11. dayes and their charges payd by the French King, a reasonable answer was giuen them, so that they were put in great hope to bring about that they came for, howbeit the French men said it could not be done shortly, because the Lady was so yong, and also that she was affianced to the Duke of Britaines eldest sonne, wherefore they must treat to breake that promise, or they could proceede any further, & thereupon the French King should send into England the next Lent, to shew how the matter went. With which answer the Englishmen were contented, they took their leaue & departed from Paris to Caleis, and so to England, the King was ioyous of their coming, and well contented with their answer.

An. reg. 19.

The Duke of Lancaster returned out of Gascoigne.

About Michaellmas the Duke of Lancaster returned out of Gascoigne into England, for that he had not been receiued in Gascoigne, as he thought he should haue been, for the people there did bitterly relect him, from bearing gouernement ouer them. The King made him good chere, and all the Winter following oft times sent to the French King, concerning the marriage, and was well inclined to haue peace, these pursutes and treaties took such effect, that their matter drew nere to a point, so that such Embassadours as were first sent out of England into France, and were againe lodged in Paris, were in number five hundred, and sojourned in Paris more then thre weekes.

T. Wallingham. Pirats of Denmark rob the English.

This yere England suffered great losse by pirats, that belonged vnto the Quene of Denmarke, who spoiled mariners and merchants, especially the men of Suffolke that assembled a multitude together, and took vpon them to fight with them, but the enemies preuailing, many of them were slaine, and very many taken prisoners, were reserued for ransome with the losse of twenty thousand pounds, which they had aborde with them to make their marchandise.

Bishop of Salisbury and other deceased.

This yere deceased Iohn of Waltham Bishop of Salisbury, Treasurer of England, who had pleased the King so greatly, that (though many murmured at it) he commanded him to be buried at Westminster among the Kings. After him Roger Walden the Kings secretary and treasurer of Caleis, was made Treasurer. Iohn de Metford Bishop of Chichester was translated to Salisbury, and the Archbishop of Diuelin to Chichester. Also Thomas Brantingham Bishop of Excester deceased, after whom succeeded Edmond mond Stafford bearer of the priuie Seale. Henry Wakefield Bishop of Worcester deceased, vnto whom succeeded at the Kings request a monke of Chester, called Tideman a Whistion.

In the moneth of Nouember King Richard caused the body of his dère krenbe Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, to be brought from Louane, and after to be buried in the priory of Colne in Essex, with solempne funeralz, which he honoured with his presence, and caused the Coffin of Cyprus, wherein his body being embalmed lay, to be opened, that he might behold his face, & touch him with his fingers openly shewing his loue to the dead carkasse, which he bare him when he was aliuie, there were at the same funeralles with the king, the Countesse of Desmond, mother of the deceased Duke, the Archbishop of Canterbury, many other Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and other religious men, but yet there were few of the Nobles, for they had not digested the hatred they had conceived against him.

Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland.

The Embassadours of England being at Paris with the French King, their matters toke such effect, that it was fully agreed that the King of England should haue in marriage Isabell the eldest daughter of King Charles, and by vertue of procuracion the Earle Marshall affianced and espoused her in the name of the King of England, & so from thenceforth she was called Quene of England. The Englishmen toke their leaue and departed to Caleis and so into England. The King was glad of their returne, and so were other, but whosoener was glad of this marriage, the Duke of Gloucester vncke vnto the King made no ioy thereof, for he saw well, that by reason of that marriage and alliance, peace should be betwene the kings, and their realmes, which grieved him, & of this matter he would oftentimes speake with his brother the Duke of Yorke, and shoue him as much as he could to his opinions, for he was but a soft Prince. But to the Duke of Lancaster his eldest brother, he durst not speake ouer largely, for he saw well that he was of the Kings opinion, and was well pleased with the Kings marriage.

This yere the King held his feast of Christmasse at Langley, whil he came to him the Duke of Lancaster, and he receiued the Duke with honour, but not with loue, as was thought, he therfore taking leaue of the King, departed from the court toward Lincoln, where Katharine Swinford then lay, whom after the feast of the Epiphanie, (al men wondering at the strangenesse of the dede) he toke to wife. This woman was bozne in Benault, daughter to Sir Paine Ruit, a Knight of that Countrey, she was in her youth brought by in the Duke of Lancasters house, and attended on his first wife Blanch the Dutchesse of Lancaster: and in the dayes of his second wife the Dutchesse Constance of Spaine, he kept the said Katharine to be his concubine, who after was married to a Knight of England named Swinford, that was now deceased. Befoze she was married, the Duke had by her foure children, thre sons, & a daughter, one of the sons hight Iohn Bewford, the second Thomas de Bewford, and the other Henry, who was brought by at Akon in Almanie, procured a god Lawper, and was after Bishop of Winchester, and Ioan a daughter for the loue the Duke had to those his children, he married their mother, the said Katharine Swinford, being now a widow, as befoze is said. The great Ladies of England, as the dutchesse of Gloucestre, the countesse of Darby, the countesse of Arundell, and others descended of the blood royall, greatly disdayned that she should bee matched with the Duke of Lancaster, and by that meanes accounted second person in the Realme, and be preferred in rounne afoze them; and therefore they said they would not come where she should be present, for it should bee a shame to them, that a woman of so base birth, that had been concubine to the Duke should goe and haue place befoze them.

Londo bridge.

This yere during the peace, many Noble men of England frequented Scotland, and many Scottes frequented England, thzough the which, oftines, many honourable toznaments were done betwixt Englishmen and Scottes, in defence of their honours and glozie in armes: Among whom was not a little praised, the honourable victozy gotten by Dauid Crauford on the Bzidge at London against the Lord Welles in this manner: The Lord Welles was sent Embassadour into Scotland, concerning certaine high matters betwixt the two Kings of England and Scotland, and when he was at a solemne banquet, where Scottish men and Englishmen were communing of dedes of armes, the Lord Welles said, Let words haue no place, if ye know not the chualty and valiant dedes of Englishmen, appoint me a day and place when ye list, and ye shall haue experterce. Then said Dauid Earle of Crauford, I assent, and incontinently, by consent of either party, a day and place was assigned. The Lord Welles chose the bzidge of London for the place, and Earle Dauid chose S. Georges day for the time. Thus departed the Lord Welles toward London. Afoze the day Earle Dauid came with thirtie persons well appointed to London: As sone as the day of battell was come, both the parties were conueyed to the bzidge, and sone after by soun of trumpet, the two parties ran hastily together, on their barbed hozses, with square grounden speares to the death. Earle Dauid notwithstanding the valiant dint of speares bzoken on his helmet, and visage, fate so strongly, that the people moued with vaine suspitton, cryed, Earle Dauid contrary to the law of armes, is bound to the saddle: Earle Dauid hearing this murmure, dismounted off his hozse, and without any suppozt or helpe ascended againe into the saddle. Incontinent they rushed together with the new speares, the second time with burning ire to conquer honour: but in the third course the Lord Welles was sent out of his saddle, with such a violence, that he fell to the ground: Earle Dauid seeing his fall, dismounted hastily from his hozse, and tenderly embraced him, that the people might vnderstand, he fought with no hatred, but onely for the glozy of victozy: and in the signe of more humanitie, he visited him euery day, while he recovered his health, and then returned into Scotland.

Froissart.

The same season was sent into England from the French King, Valerian Earle of S. Paul with certaine articles concerning the treaty of the peace. The King receiued him topouly, and heard well his message, and said vnto him aparte, Faire brother, as to the treatie of peace betwene me and my my father of France, I am right well inclined thereunto, my brethren, and two uncles of Lancaster and Poike incline right well thereunto: but mine uncle the Duke of Gloucester, who is a right perillous man, letteth it as much as he can. Sir, quoth the Earle of Saint Paule, it behoueth you to winne him with faire words, and gine him great gifts. In the name of God (saide the king) ye say well, and thus shall I doe. The Earle of Saint Paule saide, the French king with his uncles should come to Saint Omers, and bying with him his daughter, so that the king of England would come to Caleis, and so betwene Saint Omers and Caleis the two kings should méete and speake together, whereby should increase loue and amity: And if they could not conclude on some peace, yet at the least the truce might be prolonged to endure for thirtie or fortie yéeres, betwene the two realmes, and their allies: this deuise seemed good.

And so when euery thing was ready, the king and the Earle of Saint Paul passed ouer. And the king of England with his uncles came to Caleis with many Lords and Ladies: and the Duke of Burgoyne one of the French kings uncles came to Saint Omers, and from thence to Caleis, to the king of England, and there consulted together on certaine articles of the peace, wherunto the K. of England lightly inclined. The Duke of Burgoyne and Earle of Saint Paule returned to Saint Omers, &c. And the king of England with his uncles into Englad, leauing their wiues at Caleis, til their returne.

William Courtney Archbishop of Canterbury, deceased on the first of August, after he had late Archbishop of Canterbury sixtē yéeres & moze: this William Courtney vpon the dissolution of the Hospitall, called Noni operis at Maidstone, erected there a Colledge secular Priestes, the master to be a Prebend, which Colledge at the general suppression was valued in land by yéere at 139. pounds, seuen shillings five pence: he builded much at Maidstone: hee gaue by testament 1000. markes towards the ameuement of the body of the Church of Christ in Canterbury, where he was buried. Thomas Arundell brother to the Earle of Arundell succeeded him in the Archbishoprike of Canterbury, he had bene first Bishop of Ely, where he had made much faire building in the palace, he gaue to y<sup>e</sup> Church there a table of gold & precious stones valued at 300. markes, he built the great gate-house of his Tonne in Holbozne of London: he was from thence translated to Poike, where besides his great building, & rich ornaments giuen, he gaue to that Church, of plate two great basons of siluer and gilt, two great censers, two other basons of siluer, and two cruces, he gaue to the vse of the Vicars a siluer cup of great weight, and a bolle of siluer of an higher price, for the vse of the Chapter, &c. and was now translated to the see of Canterbury, he forthwith renounced his office of chancellor, wherunto was admitted Edmond Stafford Bishop of Erclesher.

Ye haue heard how the king of England was returned from Caleis into England, & there remained till Michaelmasse, that the Parliament at Westminster should beginne. In the meane season great prouision was made at Caleis, and at Guisnes for the king & his Lords sent from the ports of England on that coast, also great prouision was had of Flaunders, al which came by sea to Caleis. And likewise for the French king and his brother the Duke of Orleans, and his uncles and other Prelates and Lords of Fraunce, great provision was made at Saint Omers, at Arras, at Tournay, at Arde, Moutoires, and at all other houses and Abbeyes thereabout, there was nothing spared on either part, especially the Abbey of Saint Bertine was well replenished of all things to receive the kings.

The Parliament beganne at Westminster, at Michaelmasse, and it was ordained to endure eight and forty daies, but it was abridged; for the king would not tarry there more then five daies, wherein he declared the things pertaining to the Realme, especially such matter as touched himselfe, and the cause why he came from Caleis. Which things being dispatched, the king returned againe to Caleis with his Uncles of Lancaster and Gloucester, and other Prelates and Lords of England. The Duke of York carried still in England with the Earle of Darby to gouverne the Realme in the kings absence. As soon as the French king knew that the king of England was returned to Caleis, he sent to him the Earle of Saint Paul to shew him what order was taken in Fraunce concerning his marriage, which the king liked well.

When the Duke of Lancaster and his sonne, the Duke of Gloucester and his sonne, the Earle of Rutland, the Earle marshall, Earle of Huntington, the kings Chamberlaine and many other Lords and knights, Esquires and Ladies, rode with the Earle of S. Paule, to S. Omers, where they were well received of the Duke of Burgoyne, and of the Dutchesse, the Duke of Bypaine and other. All the chere that could be devised was made to the English Lords and Ladies: there was the Dutchesse of Lancaster, her son, and two daughters, there was great gifts given of plate, of golde and silver, nothing was spared, insomuch that the Englishmen had marvaile, especially the Duke of Gloucester, who saide to his counsell, I see well there is great riches in the Realme of France, there was much given to him: he took ever all their gifts, but alwaies the rancor abode in his heart: which the Duke of Burgoyne well perceived. When the Lords and Ladies of England had been royally feasted, then was communication had how the two kings should meete and speake together, and how the Ladie should be delivered, wherupon appointment was made, and leaue taken on all parts. The English part returned to Caleis to the king, and shewed what chere they had, and what presents had been given them, which newes pleased well the king.

Anon after the French king came to Saint Omers, having the Duke of Bypaine in his company, where it was ordained that the Dukes of Berry, Burgoyne and Bourbon, should go to Caleis to speake with the king of England, where they were joyously received, and had as good chere as could be devised. The three Dukes had secret communication with the king & his counsell, from whence they returned to Saint Omers to the French king, and shewed how they had sped. When the French king went to the Basted of Arras, the Duke of Burgoyne to Moutoires, the Duke of Bypaine to the towne of Elgue, and the Duke of Berry to Balingham. In every parte about, there were were pitcht by tents and pavilions, and all the countrey full of people, what of Fraunce and of England. The king of England came to Guines with the Duke of Lancaster, and the Duke of Gloucester to Hames.

Thus on the Eve of Simon and Jude, about ten of the clocke in the forenoon, the kings departed out of the tents, the which were pitcht not farre asunder, and came a foot the one to the other, and met at a certaine place appointed, on the one side there was aranged 400. knights of Fraunce, armed with their swordes drawn: And on the other part, 400. knights of England in like manner, so the two kings passed thorow them.

The Dukes of Lancaster and of Gloucester ledde the French king, and the Duke of Berrey, and of Burgoyne led the king of England, thus came forth the 800. knights, all which knights, when the two kings came fust together, knéled downe, the two kings met together bare headed, and a little inclined, and toke each other by the hands, then the French king led the king of England into his tent, which was noble and rich, and the four Dukes toke each other by the hands, and followed the two kings, and other knights after, the Frenchmen on the one side, and the Englishmen on the other side: and so they stood regarding each other till all was done. So the two kings hand in hand entred the French kings tent. Then the four Dukes knéled downe befoze the kings, and they raised them vp and so talked together: then the two kings went a little apart, & talked a certaine space. In the meane time wine and spices were brought, the Duke of Berrey serued the French king of spice, & the Duke of Burgoyne of wine: And the Dukes of Lancaster & Gloucester serued the king of England, & other knights & Esquires serued the other Prelates and Lords. This busines done, the two kings toke leaue each of other, & so returned to their tents, & toke their horses and rode, the king of England to Guines, the Dukes of Lancaster, & Gloucester, to Hames, & the other to Calets: the French k. rode to Corbe, & the Duke of Orleans with him, the Duke of Berrey to Doznan, & the Duke of Burgoyne to Mountoire.

the king of England and of France.

On Simon & Judes day, about 11. a clocke, the king of England & his Uncles and other Lords came to the French king into his tent, where they were received right honourably. Then tables were set vp, and the two kings sate at one table alone, the French king on the right hand, the Dukes of Berrey, Burgoyne & of Bourbon serued the two kings. This dinner was taken in the French kings tent, & after wine & spices taken, the young Quéene was brought forth accompanied with a great number of Ladies & damosels, & there she was deliuered to the king of England, & every man toke their leaue to depart. The young Quéene was set in a rich litter, and there went no more French Ladies with her but the Lady of Colwy, there were Ladies of England, the Dutchesse of Lancaster, Poerke, Gloucester, the Lady Namure, the Lady Poynings, & many other, who receiued the Quéene with great ioy. Thus the king of England and his young Quéene, with their company rode to Calets the same night. And the French king and his company to Saint Omers.

of Canterbury doing the office, at the which time there was a great feast, and great larges.

On the next morrow the Dukes of Orleans and Barbon came to Calais, to see the King & the Quene, and on the next morrow they took their leave, and departed to St. Omers to the French king, and the same day the King and the Quene took their ship, and had faire passage: for within three houres they arrived at Dover, notwithstanding by tempest they lost their tents and household stuffe, from Dover they rode to Rochester, to Dertford, to Eltham, and so to London, whereof the Citizens being warned, made out certaine horsemen well appointed, all in one livery of colour, with devises imbrodered on their sleeves, that every company might be knowne from other, the which with the Mayor and his brethren, clothed in Scarlet, mette the King and Quene on the blacke Heath, and there doing their duties, and attended by on them till they came to Newington, where the king commanded the Mayor with his company to returne, so that he was appointed to lodge that night at Benington.

Quene Isabel crowned.

The 13. of Nouembr, the young Quene was conueyed from Benington, through Southwark, with great pompe into the Tower of London, at which time there went such a multitude of people to see her, that upon London bridge nine persons were crowded to death, of whom the Mayor of Epsom in Essex was one, and a two shipful matrone that dwelt in Cornhill was another. The morrow after she was conueyed to Westminster, and there crowned with all the honour that might be deuised.

Parliament at London.

The 22. of January a Parliament began at London, in the which the Duke of Lancaster caused to be made legitimate, the issue which he had begotten of Katherine Swinford, before she was his wife. And the same time John sonne to the said Duke of Lancaster and the said Katherine, was created Earle of Somerset, and the Duke gaue him to surname Sir Bello Forto or Bowfort. It was ordained in this Parliament, that Iustices should not haue to sit with them any as assistant: there was a tenth granted by the Cleargy to the king. At this time king Richard contrary to his oath, reuoked Robert Belknap, John Holte, William Brugh knights of the Bath, and Iustices, forth of Ireland.

This yere when the realme of England seemed to enjoy the chiefest peace that might be, by reason of the kings marriage, and the great riches that were heaped by together by the same, and by the reason of the truce of 20. yers established, and the presence of so many noble men as the like no foraine realme was able to shew, sodainly al things were troubled & brought into a turmoile whilst the king at Plashy in Essex, upon a sodaine took his vnkle the Duke of Gloucester by force of armes, he suspecting no such thing, & caused him to be conueyed to Calais, there to be kept in prison, & caused the Earle of Warwick to be arrested and imprisoned, the same day that he had bidden him to dinner, notwithstanding that he shewed him very good countenance, & had promised him great friendship: beside that he deceived the Earle of Arundel with fayre words, (who was well able to haue defended himselfe, & to haue deliuered his friends, the Duke of Gloucester & the Earle of Warwick,) and notwithstanding ding hee yeelbed himselfe quietly, he sent him to the Ile of Wight, there to be imprisoned untill the Parliament. And to the end there should be no commotion among the commons for the imprisoning of the Nobles, he caused to be proclaimed that the apprehensio of them, was not for any old displeasure, but for new transgressions committed against the king, shortly after he caused the said Nobles to be indited at Pottingham, and suborned such as should appeach them in the next Parliament, to wit, Edw. Earle of Rutland, Thomas Mowbrey Earle marshall, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, John Holland Earle of Huntington, John Bewford Earle of Somerset, John Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, & Tho. Spencer, Wil. Scrope the K. Chamberlaine. And in the meane season the king assembled together to guarde his person, many malefactors of the Countie of Chester which kept watch and ward both day and night about him. When the king caused a great and generall Parliament to be summoned at Westminster, where he caused a great Hall to be builded in the midst of the pallace betwixt the clocke tower, and the doore of the grate Hall: This Parliament beganne about the fiftenth of September, at the beginning whereof Edward Stafford Bishop of Excester Lord Chancelloz, made a proposition or sermon, in the which he affirmed that the power of the king was alone and perfect of it selfe, and those that impeached it were woorthy to suffer paine of the law: to this Parliament all the Nobles came with their retinue in armes, for feare of the king: the pcolocutors were knights, in whom no goodnesse at all could be found, but a naturall couetousnesse, vnSATIABLE ambition, intollerable pride, and hatred of the truth, their names were John Bushy, William Bagot, and Thomas Greene. These required chiefly to haue the Charters of pardons reuoked and disanulled: and Bushy said to the king, because we are charged to say what they be that haue committed any offence against your maiesty, and regal anthozity, we say that Thomas Duke of Gloucester and Richard Earle of Arundel, in the 18. yere of your raigne, haue traitterously compelled you, by meane of the new Archbishop of Canterbury then Chancelloz, to grant to them a commission to gouerne your Realme, and to dispose of the state thereof, to the prejudice of your maiesty and royaltie. The same day was that commission disanulled with all Articles depending thereupon. Also the generall pardon granted after the great Parliament by them procured, and one spectall pardon for the Earle of Arundell were reuoked.

Westminster.

Bushy, Bagot, and Greene.

Also there was a petition made by the commons, John Bushy speaking for them, that the generall pardon procured and got forth, the Archbishoppe of Canterbury then Chancelloz procuring it, should be disanulled; and hee to be iudged a traytor for granting to it: whereupon the Archbishop rose and would haue answered, but the king said, to morrow, to morrow; but hee came not into the Parliament house againe: the king said, that he would deliberate of the commons petition.

Also it was established, that any traitor conuicted to stand against the kings regality, should be adiudged woorthy to suffer punishment to be appointed for such offence.

And

Four thousand Archers compassed the Parliament
house, ready to shoote.

And it was enacted, that criminall causes from thenceforth should be determined in euery Parliament, and then licence being had to depart, a great hurre was made as is bled, whereupon the kings Archers, in number foure thousand, compassed the Parliament house, thinking there had bene in the house some byople or fighting, with their bowes bent, their arrowes nocked, and drawing, ready to shoote, to the terror of all that were there, but the king herewith cunning, pacified them. On the next day, the Prelates were informed, upon paine of losing their temporalities, that they should the same day agree upon some procurator, to consent in their names to al things in that Parliament, to be dispatched, & the king had these words: Sir Iohn Bushy, because many desire that I would explaine the fiftie persons exempted in the generall pardon, I will briefly: that what man soeuer desireth this, is worthy of death: first, because he fleeth: secondly, because I haue excepted those that are to be impeached in this Parliament: thirdly, because other of their associates hearing them oppressed, would be afraid where no feare is. On the next day, the Archbishop of Canterbury commeth to the pallace to appeare in the Parliament, but the king commaunded him by the Bishoppe of Carlile that he should returne to his house, and from thenceforth he appeared not. The Prelates made Thomas Percy the kings Steward of household, their procurator, to consent in all things in this Parliament to be done. Also sir Iohn Bushy had these words, our Soueraigne Lord the king, because the second Article in the Parliament is for punishment to be appointed for such as violate the kings royall authoritie, I beseech your grace that you will authorize me by way of appealing, of accusing, or impeaching, with licence to make declaration from one to the rest so often and when to me and my fellowses it may seeme expedient, and it was granted: then Bushy had these words, I accuse Thomas of Arundell, Archbishop of Canterbury, of thersold treason.

First, of the commission in granting the regiment of gouernement of the Realme to Thomas Duke of Gloucester, and to Richard Earle of Arundell at his instance, who rather because he was your Chancellor, should haue refused it.

Secondly, for that vnder pretence of that commission, they traisterously usurping the iurisdiction of your royall authoritie, held a solempne Parliament traisterously in prejudice of your regaltie.

Thirdly, because that by the said usurping, Sir Simon de Burley, and Sir James Barnes Knights, and faithfull Lieges to you, were traisterously murdered, and put to death, of which things, we your Commons demand iudgement, worthy of so high treason, to be terribly pronounced by you, and because the Archbishoppe is a man of great consanguinitie, affinitie, power, and most politike wit, and cruell nature, for the preservation of your estate, and the whole kingdomes, by the petition of this present Parliament, I require that he may be put into safe custody, vntill the finall execution of his iudgement.

The king herunto answered, that for the excellence of his dignity he would take deliberation till the next morrow, and all other that were put into the same same commission, he pronounced them to be his faithfull liege people, and boide from that treason, and especially Alexander Neuell, late Archbischoppe of Pozke, and then sir Edmond of Langley, Duke of Pozke, Uncle to the king, and sir William Wikeham Bischoppe of Winchester, that were put into the same Commission, with teares fell downe on the ground befoze the king, and gaue him humble thankses for that grace and benefite bestowed on them.

Also on S. Mathewes day, Edward Earle of Rutland, the Carles of Kent, Huntington, Pottingham, Somerset, and Salisbury, with the Lords Spencer and Scrope, in a sute of red golwones of silke garbed, and bordered with white silke, and embzodered with Letters of Golde, proponed the appeale by them to the king at Pottingham, befoze set forth: in the which, they accused Thomas Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earle of Arundell, Thomas Earle of Warwike, and Thomas de Mortimere Knight, of the pzemised treasons, and of an armed insurrection of Haringey Parke, traitterously attempted against the king, and putting in sureties for the prosecuting of their appeale. Richard Earle of Arundell was arraigned in a red Colow, and a Scarlet hood, and forthwith the Duke of Lancaster said to the Lord Neuell, take from him his girdle and hode, and so it was done, and here with the Articles of appeale being to the said Earle declared, with a balliant and a bolde minde, he denied that he was a traytour, and required the benefite of the pardon, protesting that he would not go from the fauour of the king and his grace. The Duke of Lancaster said to him, thou traytour, that pardon is reuoked. The Earle answered, truly thou lyes, I was neuer traitour. Also, the Duke of Lancaster said, why diddest thou purchase thy pardon: the Earle answered, to escape the tongues of mine enemies, of whom thou art one, and verely, as farre forth as toucheth treason, thou hast moze neede of pardon then I. The king said, make answer vnto thine appeale. The Earle answered, I see well that these persons haue accused me of treason, shewing the appealements, but truly they all lye, I was neuer traytour, but I aske alwaies the benefite of my pardon, the which your grace granted to me within these five yeres now last past, being of full age, and of your francke good will and proper motion. Then said the king, I did so grant it that it should not be against me: then saide the Duke of Lancaster, then the graunt anayleth not. The Earle answered, truly of that pardon I knowe lesse then thy selfe, that was then on the further side the Seas. Then said Sir Iohn Bushy, that pardon is reuoked by the King, the Lords, and vs his faithfull people: the Earle answered, where be those faithfull people: I knowe thee well and thy company, how ye are gathered together, not to deale faithfully, for the faithfull people of the Realme are not here, and therefore the people doe lament for me, and well I know that thou hast bene euer false. And then Bushy and his fellows cryed out. Behold soueraigne Lord and King, howe this traytour goeth about to raise sedition betwixt vs, and those people that are at home. The Earle answered, ye lye, I am no traytour. Then rose the Earle of Darby and said, diddest thou not say thus to me at Huntington, where we were first assembled together to rise, that it was the best afoze all things to take the king. The Earle said to the Earle of Darby, thou lyest on thy head, I neuer thought of my Soueraigne Lord the King, but that that was good, and soz his honour. Then said the king, diddest not thou say to me in time of thy Parliament, in the Bathe behind the White Hall, that Sir Simon de Burley was worthe of death for many causes: and I answered, that I knew no cause of death in him, and yet thou and thy fellows diddest trafterously put him to death, and then the Duke of Lancaster pronounced iudgement against him in this manner: Richard, Iohn, Steuard of England, iudge thee to be a Traytour, and I condemne thee to be drawen and hanged, to be beheaded and quartered, and thy landes, taylored and not taylored, from thee and from thine heires of thy body descending, to be confiscate: then the King for reuerence of his blood, commaunded him onely to be beheaded, and then was he ledde to the Tower hill, and there beheaded: the Augustine friers in London toke vp his body and buried it in their Church, on the south side of their Quire, and after on his graue a sumptuous Tombe was set of marble stone. Also the same day, the king appointed the Lord Cobham (accused by the commons) to be arraigned. Also vpon the Saturday, sir Thomas de Mortimer was summoned, vpon paine to be banished as a Traytor, within sixe moneths to come to be tryed in iudgement: and then said the king, peraduenture the Earle of March cannot take him, and therefore I will so long stay for his certificate out of Ireland.

Earle of Arundel beheaded.

Also, a declaration was made, that all benefices or gifts, granted or alienated by those that were already condemned, or after were to be condemned in this Parliament, and other whatsoeuer, granted since the tenth yere of this kings raigne, should be reuoked. Also, on Monday following, the certificate given in of the Earle of Nottingham, then capitaine of Caleis, in whose custody the Duke of Glocester was, that the same Duke might not be brought to be tried in iudgement, because he was dead in his custody at Caleis, at the petition yet of the said appellants, the same sentence was pronounced against him which had bene pronounced earst against the Earle of Arundell.

Duke of Glocester condemned to die after he was dead.

Also the Archbishop of Canterbury, first his tempozalties being confiscated was banished the realme. On the Tuesday, Rikell one of the kings Iustices, borne in Ireland, read certaine confessions drawen in writing vpon the said treasons, affirming that the same were the confessions of the said Duke, by him put forth or discovered, and written with his owne hand.

Archbishop of Canterbury his goods confiscated.

Also, the Earle dome of Chester was aduanced to the honour of a principality, by annexing thereto the lands of the said Earle of Arundell confiscated.

Also, the same day, Iohn Earle of Salisbury made request to haue a Scire facias granted to him against the Earle of March, for the Lordship of Denbigh in Wales, and the king answered thereupon that he would take deliberation. Also on the Wednesday, it was ordained, that the lands of the said Earle of Arundell, annexed to the Duchie of Chester, should enjoy the libertties of the same Duchie, excepted that to the Welchmen of those parts, their old lawes and customs should still remaine and be continued.

The

The Castell of Lyons, with the seignioꝝ of Bromfeld, & Pale, to the said Castell belonging. The Castell of Chirke with the seignioꝝ of Chirkland to the said Castell belonging. The Castell of Oswaldes street, with the towne well walled with stone, with the hundred, and the eleuen townes to the said Castell belonging. The Castell of Isabell, with the seignioꝝ to the same belonging to the Castell of Dillilay, with the appurtenance in the Countie of Shrophire, and the reuerſion of the seignioꝝ of Cloue with their appurtenances, which Edward Earle of Rutland then held for terme of his life. All which Townes, Castels, and Seignioꝝ aforesaid were belonging to Richard late Earle of Arundell, and which by force of the iudgement giuen against the said Earle in the said Parliament, forſeit to our Soueraigne Lord the King, and ſhal be from henceforth annexed to the pꝛincipality, oꝝ Dukedome of Chester. Also it was ordained that such as gaue eyther counsell, ayde, oꝝ fauour to the children of them that were condemned, oꝝ that ſhould be condemned in this Parliament, ſhould be punished as traytors.

On Friday, the king appointed a pꝛeſcribed day to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to wit, the third of the firſt weeke, to depart the Realme.

Archbiſhop of Canterbury banished the Realme.

Also it was ordayned, that all the Lords ſpirituall and tempozall, ſhould ſwear inuolubly to obſerue whatſoener in this Parliament were enacted, and that the cenſures of the Church ſhould be pronounced by the Bꝛelates against all thoſe that ſhould go against the ſame.

Also, the Earle of Marwiſke was arraigned, & his hood being taken off, and the appeale read, as he had been ſome miſerable old woman, coſſeſſed all things conteyned in the appeale, weeping, wailing, and howling, to be done traytꝛously by him, and ſubmitting himſelfe to the kings grace in all things, ſoꝝ rowing that euer he had bene aſſociate vnto the appellants. Then the king demanded of him by whom he was allured to ioyne with them, & he answered, by Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, and the Abbot of S. Albons, and a Monke recluſe in Weſtminſter, and beſought the king of grace & mercy, and the king granted him life to be led in perpetuall pꝛiſon out of the Realme, his goods moneable & vnmoueable to be conſiſcate, as the Earle of Arundels had bene, and the king commaunded that he ſhould be had to the Tower of London, and after, to be coꝛueyed ouer to the caſtel within the Iſle of man, vnder the wardſhip of William Scroope then Lord of the ſaid Iſle, to remaine there in perpetuall pꝛiſon, and on the morrow, the king granted to him and his wife ſixe C. markes yeerely during their liues. Also, the writ of Scire facias was granted to the Earle of Salſbury, against the Earle of March, for the ſaid Lordſhip of Denbigh, ſixtē daies reſpite being giuen to put in an auſwere. Item, it was ordained, that thoſe which ought money to Rochefter bꝛidge, ſhould be put in execution for the payment, to the uſe of the ſame bꝛidge.

Scroope: Lord Treasurer, Earle of Wiltshire: Sir Iohn Mountacute, Earle of Salisbury. The king added the armes of king Edward the Confessor to his, & bare them together part purpale, and the Parliament was proroged till the octaves of S. Hillary, then to be holden at Shrewsbury.

Westminster
Hall r. payed.

King Richard caused the great Hall at Westminster to be repaired, both the walles, windows, and rooffe, with a marvellous worke, and great costs, which he lented of Strangers banished out of their countreys, who obtayned licence to remayne in this countrey, by the kings Charter which they had purchased with great summes of money.

Shrewsbury.

King Richard kept his Christmas at Leichfield, and then toke his journey towards Shrewsbury, where the Parliament lately proroged, began againe, in the which it was ordayned, that all Statutes ordayned at Westminster in the 11. yere of the kings raigne, should be reuoked and disanulled, and all the articles of the same, and the heires of them that were adiudged in the saide Parliament, should be reconciled, and restored to all their lands, inheritances, and possessions: excepted, that they should haue no clayme against the withholders of the profits, and revenues of those lands in the meane time. On the morrow it was ordayned that the heires of them which were iudged and convicted in the foure Articles of high treason, should not enjoy the landes, nor any possessions of their progenitoys, but should be excluded from all and euery action and clayme for ever.

The first Article of high treason was this, if any man, of what condition soeuer he were, did imagine the kings death.

The second Article was, if any man should haue an imagination to depose the king.

The third, if any man did rise armed within the Realme of England in manner of warre against the king.

The fourth was, if any man disclaymed the kings homage.

Also the same day, the Lord Cobham was arraigned, to make answer vnto the two Articles of high treason.

The first was, that the said Lord Cobham was in counsell to make one commission against the state of the king; and likewise, that he vsed the same commission in doing iudgement against the kings will, and to the prejudice of him.

The second, that he sate in iudgement to iudge sir Simon de Burley, and James Barnes Knights of the Kings; in his absence, and against his will: and vpon this, hee was conuict and iudged to perpetuall prison within the Isle of Ierley.

Henry Duke of Hereford accused Thomas Duke of Norfolke.

On the morrow, Henry Duke of Hereford accused Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, of certaine words by him spoken, as they rode betwene London and Baynesford, tending to the dishonour of the kings person, which the Duke of Norfolk utterly denied to haue spoken; whereupon a combat was was granted them by the king to be fought at Couentry, byon the seuenth of September.

A combate granted at Couentry.

A fiftēth and a halfe was granted, and the customes of Woles, fiftie shillings of euery Sacke of euery Englishman bozn, and thre pound of euery stranger.

This Parliament ended, the king visited many places in the West part of England, as Worcester, Hereford, Bristow, Glassebury and Bath.

After this also, the king caused a Theatre to be made at Bristow, for a combate to be fought betwene two Scots, to wit, the one being an Esquire appellant, & the other a knight defendant, and the appellant was ouercome and hanged: but after this time, he made a great & marvellous strong Theatre at Couentry for the combate betwixt the Duke of Hereford, and the Duke of Norfolk, and gaue them day for the fight, the 16. of September, to wit, the feast day of S. Edich, at which day and place, a great concourse and assembly of people was there gathered out of all parts of England. When the saide Champions appeared in the Listes, ready to fight, the king commanded them to be quiet and not to fight, & then the k. sitting in his royall apparrel within his tent girt with his sword, he commanded his decree to be proclaimed, & this was the kings decree, that Henry Duke of Hereford, for his disobedience towards the king should be banished for tenne yeres, and likewise the Duke of Norfolk to be banished for euer out of England, taking of his reuenues a thousand markes by yere, till the towne of Caleis were repaired.

At the feast of S. Michael, the king caused seuentēne Counties in East England to be indited, and laid to their charges, that they had bene against him, with the Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of Arundell & Warwike, wherefoze he sent honourable men to induce the Loyds both spiritual and temporal, to make a submission by writing, sealed with their owne hands, acknowledging themselves to be traytors to the king, though they neuer offended him in word or deed. Whereon, he compelled all the religious gentlemen and commons, to set their seales to blankes, to the end he might as it pleased him oppress them severally, or all at once: some of the commons paid 1000. markes, some 1000. pounds, &c.

Blank Charter.

Also, he ordained throught euery prouince in England, that all gentlemen, and men of substance, should be sworn firmly to maintaine according vnto their possible power, all the statutes, Articles and constitutions ordained in the last Parliament.

Anacustomes othes.

This yere the king kept a most royal Christmas, with euery day iustings and running at the tilt, wherunto resorted such a number of people, that there was euery day spent xxviij. or xxvi. oren, & thre hundred sherp, besides fowle without number. Also the king caused a garment for himselfe to be made of gold, siluer, and precious stones, to the value of 3000. markes.

Great iustings and feasting.

On Newyeres day, nere vnto Bedford, a very deepe water which ranne betwixt the towne of Swellstone and Harlewood, fode sodainly still and diuided it selfe, so that by the space of thre miles, the bottom remained drye, which wonder, many a one thought, did signifie the diuision of the people, and falling away from the king, which happened shortly after.

Wil. Wiliam.

Roger Mortimer Earle of March, and of Visser in Ireland, lying there in a Castell of his, there came on him a great multitude of wild Irishmen to assault him, and he issuing out, fought manfully, til he was by them hewen to peeces, whose death the king determined to reuenge.

Duke of Lancaster deceased.

The third of February died Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, at the Bishop of Elyes Inne, in Holborne by London, and was honourably buried in Saint Pauls Church at London, by Blanch his first wife, his sonne Henry Duke of Hereford being then beyond the seas.

King Richard
sailed into Ireland.

About Whitson tide, king Richard with a flauite of 200. ships, sailed from Milford haue, towards Ireland, and arriued at Waterford on the last day of may, from whence, he marched with an army of 30000. to Kilkenny, foure score miles within the countrey, and there remained 14. daies, tarrying for Edward Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle, that kept not the right course.

Ann. reg. 23.

On Midsummer euen he went from thence towards the countrey of Mackmur, who remayned amongst the woods with 3000. men, right hardy, and such as seemed but little to feare the Englishmen. At the entring of the woods, the king commaunded fires to be fled, so that many a house, and many a village was bzent, & there the king made Henry the Duke of Hereford his sonne knight, who was afterward king Henry the fifth, with tenne other. 2500. pioners were appointed to fell the woods, and make waies for the Englishmen. The Irishmen feared greatly the shot of the Englishmen, but yet with their darts they assailed, and slew diuers as they caught them at advantage. The vncle of Mackmur came in and yielded himselfe to the king, with a wythe about his necke, and many other naked and bare-legged, did the like, all which, the king pardoned. After this, the king sent to Mackmur, promising him, that if he would come in as his vncle had done, with the wythe about his necke, he should be pardoned: but he vtterly refusing, said, he would fight to death in defending his right, for he knew the Englishmen wanted victuals, and more then they had brought with them could not be bought for siluer or gold. There was already such scarcity, that there were some foure, some fire, that had but a small loafe of bread to liue by the day, and some that eate not a graine in fve daies together. In this estate they remayned eleuen daies, many of their horses were lost for lacke of meate. In the meane season yet came thre shippes from Dublin fraught with victuals, for the which was great strife and pzease especially for the wine of Olsey and Spayne. The morow after the 13. departed from thence, keeping the hye way toward Dublin, maugre all the noise of the enemies: at what time Mackmur sent a messenger with notice to the king that he would be his friend, & aske him mercy, or els, if it pleased him to treat of peace, to send some noble men to him: whereupon the Earle of Gloucester was sent, who led with him the reuerward whereof he was Captaine, being two hundred launces, and a thousand archers, betwixt two woods farre from the sea in the declining of an hil they met with the Irish, Mackmur himselfe rode on a white horse without saddle or other furniture, that cost him (as was said) foure hundred kine, which horse he ran down the hil, that beholders reported they they neuer had sene Hare nor Doere to haue runne so swiftly. In his right hand he bare a Dart great and long, which he threwe exceeding well. He was a mightie strong man of personage. There the Earle and he talked a good while, about the murdering of the Earle of March, and after of other things, but agree they could not, and so departed.

The Earle aduertised the king what he had found, which was nothing, but that the enemy would cry mercy, so as he might be sure to haue peace without other grieve, other wise, he would (so long as he liued) defend himselfe: wherefore, the king (in his wrath) not knowing what let might happen, sware, that he would neuer depart Ireland, till he had him eyther alieue or dead. The hoste dislodged for lacke of victuals, they were a thirtie thousand at their coming ouer, that lay then at Dubline fiftene daies, the king forthwith discharging his army into thre parts, sent them out to seeke Mackmur, promising an hundred markes to him that could bring him in, which offer was well hearkened vnto, for it sounded well, but he could not be caught: and the same day Edward Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle Constable of England, arrived with an hundred sail, of whose coming, the king was very glad, though he indeed had tarried long, and might haue come much sooner.

They remayned fife weekes at Dubline, and heard no newes out of England, the passage was so dangerous, the wind being contrary, and tempests so great, at the length came a ship with heauie newes, how the Duke of Hereford, and now by the decease of his father Duke of Lancaster, was arrived in England at Ravenspoye fast by Birdlington besides Wadlington in Dorke shire, and had beheaded William Scroope Earle of Wiltshire, Treasurer of England, John Bushy, Henry Greene, and other, and had caused Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterbury to preach against King Richard, who also shewed a Bull procured from Rome, promising remission of sinnes to all those which should aide the said Henry, in conquering of his enemies, and after their death to be placed in paradise, which preaching moued many to cleaue to the Duke.

The Duke of Hereford returned into England.

Upon this newes the king being perswaded to make haste ouer, the Duke of Aumarle said, it was better to stay till his ships might be brought together, for there were but an hundred ready to make saile, whereupon John Mounacute Earle of Salisbury was sent with a power, whilst the king going to Waterford might gather his fleet, who promised within fife daies to haue followed him. The Earle of Salisbury landed at Conwey, where he was some aduertised, how the Duke had taken the moze part of England, and that all the Lords were got to him, with moze then threescore thousand men. The Earle of Salisbury caused to summon the Welchmen and them of Cheshire, to come to him, so that (wening the king had been arrived at Conwey) within foure daies there were come together soztie thousand men, ready to go against the Duke of Hereford, where they stayed fourteen daies, but when they saw the king came not, they stealed away, & left the Earle of Salisbury in maner alone, so that vnnearth he had an hundred men with him. The Duke of Hereford aduanced to wards the Earle of Salisbury, who withdrew him into Conwey. The king thzough enill counsell estate after the Carles departure 18 daies, and then arrived at Milford haven, with the Dukes of Aumarle, Erceffer, and Surrey, and diuers other of the Nobility, with the Bishops of London, Lincolne, and Carlile, & many other, that he might with an army meete the Duke befoze he had gotten his assitters together, but after his coming into England, and vnderstanding the Dukes preparation, he let fall his courage to giue battell, knowing soz certain that the people assembled against him, would rather die then giue place, as well soz the hatred as feare, which they had conceiued of him: wherfoze leauing his army with the Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle, Constable and chiefe gouernour of his army at Milford, went from thence priuily about midnight following, disguised like a Priest, soz feare to be knowen, with 14. persons only, who went to Conwey, thinking the Earle of Salisbury had there held the field. There were with him the Dukes of Erceffer and Surrey, and the Earle of Gloucester, that continued faithfull vnto the last houre.

There were three Bishops also, of which, two did not like god men, the Bishop of Lincolne, and Saint Dauids, but the third continued faithfull, that was the Bishop of Carlile.

He had also two knights, Stephen Scroope, and William Fireby, and Ianico a Gascoigne. The king rode so warily by nights, that he came to Conwey at the bzeake of a day. Great sozrow and lamentation was made by the king and the Earle at their meeting, soz that the Carles hoste was dispersed and gone, some to the Duke, and some other waies.

The Duke of Aumarle, Constable and chiefe gouernour of the kings army at Milford, immediately when the kings departure was knowne, said vnto the souldiers, let vs shift for our selues masters, soz the king is fledde, where vpon euery man trusted and away. Sir Thomas Percy steward of the household, talking with the Constable also departed, and toke their way thzough Wales.

The Welchmen seeing such disorder, assembled them together, and spoiled the Englishmen of all their goods, & sent them packing in their dublets, with white stauces in their hands, soz there rode, here tenne, here twenty, here fifty, here an hundred, and so the Welchmen comming down the Mountaines, the English lost that they had. The king had many horses of the beyond Sea bzoode, and great riches in apparell and iewels, which was in the keeping of sir Thomas Percy, who with the Constable came to Duke Henry of Hereford, and moze then five hundred of their company, ail naked, whom the Welchmen had dispoiled, and beaten well.

The king being at Conwey in great discomfozt, sent the Dukes of Erceffer and Surrey, to Henry Duke of Hereford and Lancaster, to knowe what his meaning was, himsele remayning still at Conwey in great perplexity, and with him the Earle of Salisbury, the Bishoppe of Carlile, sir William Ferebe knight, sir Stephen Scroope mine authoz, and another Frenchman, in all but sixtene persons, then was newes bzought to the king how his Constable had demeaned him, and likewise his Steward, that had caused his riches to be brought a land, and going throught Wales with it, the Welchmen had taken it.

The king then by the aduise of the Earle of Salisburie departed from Conwey vnto Beawmareis, a ten miles off, and from thence, he went to Carnaruan. Beawmareis was a strong Fortresse if it had bēn manned & victualled. Carnaruan is a fayre towne, and a strong Castell, but these were vnproouided of al things, so that for five or sixe nights he lay very hard and bafe, and for victuals there was none; wherefoze he returned againe to Conwey, where hee soze lamented his estate. The Dukes of Excester & Surrey entring the City of Chester, which Duke Henry had taken, were brought straight to the Castell to the Duke, who was glad to see them, as he professed, & forthwith asked the Duke of Excester what newes, who told him from point to point, what shame and dishonoz it would be to him, if he dealt so vniustly toward his Prince, and that throught him he were deposed: he therfoze demanded answer with speed: but the Duke of Lancaster was as slowe to dispatch him, and told him hee should not go for one weeke from him, and that the king was not wel aduised to send him and his fellow, being men of such calling, sith he had other inough of meaner estate to do the message: so they remayned to their great discomfort. The Duke of Excester, Duke Henry still kept in his company; but the Duke of Surrey was committed to safe keeping within the Castell of Chester.

There is a Castell sixe miles from Chester, called Belfon Castell, builded on a rocke, very strong by situation, therein were an hundred men of armes chosen and able men, but not valiant, or faithfull to king Richard, for they deliuered it to the Duke, where they might well inough haue kept it, the ascending is so steepe: it was victualled for sixe yeres. There was found within it coyne better worth then an hundred thousand markes, beside other iewels, which king Richard caused to be kept, to the value of two hundred thousand markes, all which Duke Henry toke with him, and returned to Chester, and there taking counsell of his friends what was best to be done, the Archbishop of Canterbury toke vpon him to speake, and said: that sith the king was in Wales, which was a countrey strong by reason of the Mountaines, so that it was impossible for an army to passe with bagge and baggage, he thought it best to send vnto king Richard, & to make him beleue that he sought nothing but peace and a Parliament to be made, wherein, those that had offended in putting to death his uncle the Duke of Glocester, should be punished, and so from thenceforth the king and the Duke to be good friends, and that it should be at the kings pleasure to appoint the day and place for this Parliament; for without this shift, it should be impossible for the Duke to get him into his hands, for he might depart to sea whē he would, hauing retained at Conwey ships for that purpose.

All the other Lords assenting to this counsel, the Duke appointed the Earle of Northumberland to go to the king with foure hundred launces, and a thousand archers, which Earle, when he came to Flint castell, had it deliuered to his hands: from thence he hasted to Rudland, which was also giuen ouer to him: this Rudland is but tenne miles from Conwey, where the king was, greatly maruailing, that hee heard nothing of his brother the Duke of Excester, being now eight daies since he was sent to the Duke of Hereford. The Earle of Northumberland laid vnder a rocke, nere to the Castell of Rutland two great ambushments of his people, with commandement to keepe that passage. Then he went with five other in his company and went by the sea coast, till he came befoze the towne of Conwey, and then he sent an Herault to the king for a safe conduct, to come to his presence, to declare his message from the D. about an agrement, which safe conduct being granted, he passed the water, and entred the Castell of Conwey, where he found the K. and the Earle of Salisbury, he declared to them that peace would be made if he would be a good Judge & a true, and cause those that should be named, to be tried by Iustice at a certaine day of Parliament at Westminster, which he and the Duke should hold together, and that the Duke might keepe his place of high Judge as his father and other ancestors befoze him had done, for the space of one hundred yeres. Those that he would haue to be tried by the law, were the Duke of Excester, the Duke of Surrey, the Earle of Salisbury, the bishop of Carlelle and Tho. Marke, which five, had giuen the K. counsel to put his vnkle the Duke of Gloucester to death, and then if it should please him to pardon the Duke his wrath, he would be ready to come to him on his knees to aske him mercy, and so they might go to London together, or the one one way, and the other another. The Earle offered to sweare that all this should be perfozmed, and that the Duke had assured him by oth to stand to it. The King liking well that it should be at his liberty to go, eyther in company with the Duke, or alone vnto London, purposed to take the offer, and so to pretend some excuse for his going alone, after hee should meet with the Duke: as lacke of victuals or such like, and so to take a by-way thozow Wales, and there to raise a power, for hee promised the Lords neuer to suffer them to come to iudgement, discoursing with them, how hee would auoid all the daunger, and surely hee reuenged vpon his enemies, namely on Duke Henry of Lancaster, who with the rest should die for it, hee accorded to go to the Duke, and then (Walfe being celebrated) the Earle of Northumberland sware vpon the hoast, that the Duke should hold all that hee had told the King. The Earle basted the King for ward to horsebacke, but the King prayed the Earle to go befoze vnto Rutland, there to prepare dinner. The Earle rode a pace vntill hee came where hee might see his people vnder the mountaine, whom hee much commended for obseruing his commaundement.

betrayed.

The King passing the water rode a foure miles befoze hee came to the rocke where when he saw the ambushes he was fore abashed, knowing wel hee was betrayed by the Earle, for he was in such a place as he could not escape. The sea beating on the one side, and the rocke keeping him in on the other, and if hee should haue fled backe, they would haue caught him, ere hee could haue come to Conwey, for hee had not past thre and twenty in all of his company. The King descending the rocke, the Earle came, and kneeling down, excused the matter, saying, he had caused those people to come to guard his person, but the King told him, few would haue serued, and that it was contrary to his oth, for

so; he had promised to haue but fire in his company, and said therefore that he would goe backe to Conwey, but the Earle answered, that now he sith he had him, he would leade him to the Duke as he had promised tenne dayes since, and so he caused bread and wine to be brought and offered the King, who durst not refuse it, and after leaping on horsebacke againe they rode to Rutland to dinner, and after to Flint, where they lay that night.

Rutland.
Flint.

The morrowe being the two and twentieth day of August, the King got him to the Castle walles, where he behelde the Duke with all his hoste of an hundred thousand men comming by the sands: there came before that were departed from the army, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Percy, and the Earle of Rutland from whom the duke had taken the office of Constable, moze for a colour, then for displeasure, so; they bare the Dukes order, and not the hart, which was the Kings, the Archbishop entred first, and after the other with a great traine, they went vnto the dungeon, and then the King came downe from the walles, vnto whom they did reuerence lowly on their knées, the King toke them vp, and dreyw the Archbishop apart, and they two talked long together, but the Earle of Rutland kepte him aloofe. They toke horse againe, and rode towards the Duke that now was approaching nere.

• The King went vp againe to the walles, lamenting so; when he saw the Dukes hoste within two howe shotes of the Castle, who compassed it round about downe to the sea. The Earle of Northumberland went forth to the Duke, who after long talke, concluded, that the Duke should not enter the Castle before the King had dined, so; he was salving: so the Earle returned, and the King was set to dinner, with whom sate his assured friends the Earle of Salisbury, and the Bishop of Carlelle, Sir Stephen Scrope, and Feribe, they sate long and eate little, so; they had no haste to rise.

After dinner the Duke entred the Castle all armed, his basenet excepted. King Richard came downe to meete the Duke, who as soone as he sawe the King, fell downe on his knées, and crawing nere vnto him, he knèled the second time with his hat in his hand, and the King then put off his hode, and spake first, faire cousin of Lancaster ye are right welcome. The Duke bowing lowe to the ground answered, my Lord, I am come before you sent for me, the reason why I will shewe you. The common fame among your people is such, that ye haue for the space of twentie or xxiij. yeres, ruled them very rigorously, but if it please our Lord I will helpe you to gouerne better. The King answered, faire Cousin of Lancaster, sith it pleaseth you, it pleaseth me well.

The Duke spake as ye haue heard to the King, he spake also to the Bishop of Carlelle, to Sir Steuen Scrope, and to Feribe, but to the Earle of Salisbury he spake not, whereby the Earle perceiued that the Duke hated him deadly.

The Duke with a high sharpe voyce, had bring forth the Kings horses, and then two little nagges not worth fourtie franks, were brought forth, the King was set on the one, and the Earle of Salisburie on the other: and thus the Duke brought the King from Flint to Chester, where he was deliuered to the Duke

Chester.

Duke of Glocesters some, and to the Earle of Arundels sonne that loued him but a little, for he had put their fathers to death, who ledde him straight to the Castle.

The third day they went from Chester to Pantwich, and the next day to Newcastle, and there the Earle of Warwicks son met them, and so journeying forth, the next day they came to Staffoꝝ, and after they departed to Lichfield, where the King thought to haue escaped, slipping downe into a Garden out of a Window of a great Towꝛe, but he was espyed and thrust into the Tower againe: from Lichfield the Duke went to Couentre, but befoze they could come thither, the Welchmen did them much harme and slewe many of them, and the Englishmen, when they by great chaunce could take any of the Welchmen, they tied them to their horse tayles, and dꝛewe them after them, through wayes full of stones, and caused them to dye miserably.

The Duke passed from Couentre to Deintrie, the next day to Poꝛthampton, from thence to Dunstable, and then to Saint Albons, and a fine oꝛ fire miles befoze his comming to London, the Paioꝛ and the Companies in their liueries, with great noyle of Trumpets met the Duke, doing moze reuerence to him then to the King, reioycing that God had sent them such a Prince, that had conquered the Realme within one moneths space.

When the Duke came within two miles of the Citie, the Duke caused the host to stay, and then said to the commons of the Citie: My Masters, beholde here your King, consider what ye will doe with him. They answered, they would he should be led to Westminster, whereupon he was deliuered vnto them, and they led him to Westminster, and from thence by water to the Tower of London.

The Duke entred into London by the chiefe gate, and rode through Cheap to Saint Pauls, where he was after lodged in the Bishops pallace fine oꝛ fire dayes, and after at Saint Johns without Smithfield, where he remayned fiftene dayes, from thence he remoued to Hertford, where he abode thꝛe weeks, and then came backe to London, to holde the Parliament that began the first Wednesday of October in Westminster hall, which they had hung and trimmed sumptuously, and had caused to be set by a royall chaire, in purpose to chouse a newe King, where to the which the Prelates were set, and on the other side sate the Lords, and after the commons in order, first sate the Duke of Lancaster, then Edmond of Langley the Duke of Yorke, the Duke of Armarle, the Duke of Surrey, the Duke of Gloucester, and the Marques Dorset, then in order the Carles of Arundale, Poꝛffolke, March, Staffoꝝ, Penbꝛoke, Salisburie and Deuonshire, the Carles of Northumberland and Westmerland sate not, but went by and downe, and oftentimes kneeled as it fell in doing their offices.

The Archbishop of Canterbury made a Sermon and toke for his Theame, Habuit Iacob benedictionem à patre suo, which Sermon being ended in Latin, a Doctour of the Law, stode vp and read an instrument, in the which was contained, that King Richard had by his owne confession disabled himselfe to be woꝛthy to raigne, and that he would resigne the crowne to such a one as was sufficient sufficient to rule. This instrument being read, the Archbishop perswaded them to proceede to the election of a new King, and perceiuing they were all contented, for there were not past foure persons that were of King Richards part (and they durst say nothing) he asked each of them whom they would haue to their King, whether the Duke of Yorke or not? and they answered no: he asked if they would haue his eldest sonne the Duke of Aumarle: and they said no: he asked if they would haue his yongest sonne, and they said no: and so of diuers other: then staying a while, he asked if they would haue the Duke of Lancaster, and then they answered they would none other. This demaund being made thrice, they drew certaine instruments and charters, and read them in presence of all that were there. Then the Archbishops comming to the Duke, fell on their knees declaring to him how he was chosen King, and willed him to take regard if he would consent thereto. Then the Duke being on his knees rose and declared that he accepted the realme, sith it was ordained by God. Then the Archbishop read what the new King was bound vnto, and with certaine ceremonies signed him with the crosse, then he kissed the Archbishop, and they took the ring, with which the Kings be wedded to the Realme, and bare it to the Lord Percy, that was Constable, who receiuing it, shewed it to all the assembly, and then put it on the Kings finger, the King then kissed the Constable, and then the Archbishops led him to the siege Royall, and the King made his prayers on his knees before it, and after spake vnto them all, first to the Prelats, and then to the Lords and all other, and so set him downe in the seate: and thus he was inuested, and King Richard put downe, he sate a good while and kept silence, and so did al the rest: for they were in prayer for his prosperitie in his gouernment, and when they had ended, where the offices were boide, the King created the Lord Percy Constable, and took him the staffe: Then was chosen Ralph Earle of Westmerland Marshall, John Scirle, or Serle Chancellor, Sir Richard Clifford keeper of the priuie Seale, and many other officers were newly confirmed. After this the Archbishop spake certaine things in latine, praying for the Kings prosperitie, and the Realmes, and after spake in English bypon this following: Vir dominabitur in populo, reg. 9. &c. And then exhorting all there present to pray the like, every man sate downe. Then the King rose and made his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, then the Lords were sworn to be true to the Prince as befoze they had done to his father: his second sonne was there made Duke of Lancaster. Thus was king Richard deposed when he had reigned 22. yeres, 3. moneths, and odde dayes, in such sort as ye haue heard, whose royaltie had bin such, that wheresoeuer he lay, his person was guarded by 200. Cheshire men, he had about him 13. Bishops, besides Barons, Knights, Esquiers, and other moe then needed, insomuch that to the household came every day to meate 10000. people, as appeared by the messes told out of the kitching to 300. seruiters, &c. He was murdered on the 14. of February next following, as shall be shewed in place conuenient, and was buried first in the Church of the friers preachers at Langley besides Saint Albanes. And after by commaundement of King Henry the sixt, remoued to Westminster.

Ann. reg. 1.

Record Tower.

Enry Plantagenet bozne at Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, sonne to Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, was ordeyned King of England, moze by force then by lawfull succession or election: he began his raigne the 29. of September, in the yere of our Lord God 1399. He forthwith made new officers, to wit Thomas his second sonne Steward of England: Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Constable of England: Ralph Neuill Earle of Westmerland, Marshall of England: Sir Iohn Scerle Chancellor of England, Sir Richard Clifford keeper of his priuie scale: Iohn Norbury Esquire Treasurour, Thomas Chaucer Constable of Wallingford Castle, & other officers, and then was crowned at Westminster the 13. of October, by Thomas Arundale Archbishop of Canterbury: The Dukes of York, Surrey, Aumarle, and the Earle of Gloucester bare a Canopie ouer him. Sir Thomas Dimmocke was champion, and rode thre times about the hall. This was a noble and valiant Prince, and after the ciuill warres were appeased, shewed himselfe louing to his subjects. He made Henry his sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and heire apparant to the crowne of England.

After the solemnitie of the coronation, the Lords and commons straight proceeded to the Parliament. In which it was inquired out of the death of the Duke of Gloucester, and howe he had been murdered at Caleis by the Duke of York, folke, vpon the Kings commandement. King Henry created his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and Duke of Aquitaine. In this Parliament it was ordeined that the statutes made in the Parliament holden in the 21. yere of King Richard at Westminster, and after proceeded vnto Shrewsbury, with all the circumstances to be disanulled, reuoked, made voyde, & utterly blotted out. Also that the Parliament holden at Westminster, in the 11. yere of King Richard, be holden firme and stable. Also that the Lords and other persons which were iudged forth in the Parliament holden the 21. yere of King Richard, and their heires that be dead, should be wholly restored to their possessions without any suing liuerie thereof to be made, excepted that the Lords and other shall haue nothing of the issues receiued in the meane time. The King gaue to the Earle of Northumberland the Ile of Man, to be holde of the king by seruaice, to beare the sword with which he entred into England. And to the Earle of Westmerland he gaue the Countie of Richmond. Also iudgement was giuen against the Appellants of the Duke of Gloucester in this manner: the Lords in this present Parliament by the Kings assent, iudge that the Dukes, of Aumarle, Surrey, and Grester now present and were appellants, shal lose their names of Dukes and honours from hence forth, together with the dignities, of Dukes, and that the Marques Dorset that is present, lose his name of Marques, and the Earle of Gloucester, which lose his name for him and his heires, as the aboue named persons doe theirs, and that al the Castles, possessions or manors which they had of them that belonged to those whom they appealed from the day of the arrest of the Duke of Gloucester, and the other Lords, or after at any time, simply and without fauour or mercy, they shall lose them: and that all other Castles, possessions, manors, Lordships, dominions and liberties, which they held of the Kings gift, that day or after should rest in the Kings grace from that heure, and that all letters patents and charters, which they or any of them had of the said names, Castles, Dominions, possessions, and liberties should be surrendred vp into the Chancery, there to be cancelled, and that they stand in state which they had in name and possession befoze the said day of the said arrest.

The King to shew to all men in all Countries about by what right and title he had taken vpon him the crowne and realme, sent Embassadors to Rome, Iohn Treneuant Bishop of Hereford, Iohn Cheyne Knights, & Iohn Cheyne Esquire. Into France he sent Walter Tricklew Bishop of Durham, Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, and William Heron. Into Spaine Iohn Trenor Bishop of S. Davids, and Sir William Par Knight: Into Almanne the Bishop of Bangor with other.

Messengers sent into diuers countries, to declare the cause of deposing of King Richard.

The Scottes in time of the Parliament taking occasion by the absence of the Northen Lords, and because the same time the North parts were soze oppressed by a great Pestilence entred as enemies, and toke the Castle of Marke, and kept the same a certaine time, but at length spoiled and utterly ruinated it, and many other mischiefes they did in the Countrey. Thomas Moubrey Duke of Norfolk, which was exiled, dyed at Venice, in his returne from Ierusalem. Also the Duchesse of Gloucester dyed, and her sonne and heire Humfrey dyed of the Pestilence when he was sent for, forth of Ireland.

The King held his feast of Christmasse in his Castle of Windsor, where Iohn Holland late Duke of Excester and Earle of Huntingdon, Thomas Holland late Duke of Surrey & Earle of Kent, Edmond late Duke of Aumarle, and Earle of Rutland, son to the Duke of Yorke, Iohn Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Spencer, Sir Ralph Lumly, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Benedict Cely Knights, with others that fauoured King Richard conspired against King Henry, and appoynted priuily to murder him, vnder the colour of Iustice and other pastimes pretended. And the time approaching of their purpose, they sent messengers to London with letters to the Duke of Aumarle, that he should not fayle to come at that day appoynted with his company, to helpe to doe the feate whereunto he was swozne: but his minde being altered, he bare the letters straight to his father the Duke of Yorke, who caused a number of his men forthwith to carry his son to the King, where he shewing his letters, the King would not beleue them: but the same morning came the Mayor of London to the Court, and informed him of the matter, whereupon the King made no tarrance, but got him forth toward London, in company of the Mayor and other. But befoze the King could gette London on his backe, his enemies came to Windsor, and there entred the Castle with an armed band of 400. men on the fourth of January at night, where understanding that the king was escaped their handes, being sore amazed, they withdrew from Windsor, unto Sunning, a certayne Mannour neare to Reading, where the Quene wife to king Richard then lay, where they perswaded her household, that king Richard was escaped out of Pomfret Castell, and they would go to him: from thence they went to Wallingford, and after to Abingdon, moving the people to take armes upon them, and to go meet their king Richard. After this they came to Faringdon, in the Vale of White Horse in Berkeleshire, and the same day to Cirester, on the xiiij. day late in the evening, and there harbozed, with a great number of men of armes and many archers: there they byted that k. Richard was escaped forth of prison, and that he was there with them, & to make their wordes to haue the more credite, they had got a Chaplein of k. Richards called Maudelen, so like to him in all proportion and fauour, that one could bnneth be discerned from the other: many times (saith mine author) I haue scene him in Ireland rise with the king his master: so faire a Priest and goodly a person, I had not lightly scene. They put him in armour with a crowne on his Helmet, so as all men might take him for king Richard. On the morrow being Wednesday, the people of that town mistaking of their proceedings, fought against them, and at length tooke the chiefeest of them, and ledde them to the Abbey there, and put them in a faire chamber, vnder safe custody. And on the Thursday the sayd Lordes, fearing the people, imagined how to escape out of their handes, and caused some of their seruantes to sette fire on certaine houses in the Towne, thinking that thereupon the people would depart from them, and seeke to stanch the fire: but it chaunced contrary, for the people turned into marneplous rage against them, ranne vpon them with great violence, and drew them into the market place, and there they beheaded Iohn Holland the Duke of Excester, Thomas Holland the Duke of Surrey, and the Earle of Salisburie, the third day after the Epiphanie: their seruants that were with them, were by and by taken and as prisoners bound and brought to Orford, and on Monday following were beheaded in the Castell there, to the number of fire and twentie persons. Also Sir Thomas Blunt Knight was beheaded with them. The week next following, was beheaded Tho Spencer Earle of Gloucester at Bristow: not long after was Sir Barnard Brocas beheaded at London, and a Priest named Iohn Maudelen, that was like king Richard, and another Priest called William Feribe. The Bishop of Carlile was impeached and condemned of conspiracie, but was pardoned.

The sixth day of Februarie King Henry caused the blanke Charters, made to king Richard, to be burnt, at the standart in Cheape of London.

King Richard was imprisoned in Pomfrait Castle, where xv. dayes and nights they bered him with continuall hunger, thirst and cold, and finally bereft him of his life, with such a kinde of death as neuer before that time was knownen in England (saith Sir Iohn Fortiscute.) He died the xliij. day of Februarie, whose body was brought to y<sup>e</sup> Towre of London, and so throught the City to Pauls Church bare faced, where he stood thre dayes for all beholders
and

and had seruite, where King Henry was present. From thence he was caried to Langley, and there buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers. Upon his death the famous and excellent Poet Iohn Gower, wrote certaine verses, which may be englished thus.

O Mirrour for the world meete, which shouldst in Golde be sette,
By which all wise men, by foresight, their prudent wittes may whette.
Lo, God doth hate such rulers, as here viciously doe liue:
And none ought rule, that by their life,
doe ill example giue.
And this King Richard witnesseth well, his end this plaine doth shewe:
For God allotted him such ende, and sent him so greate woe,
As such a life deserude: as by the Chronicles thou mayst knowe.

The king with a great army went into Scotland, spoiled the countrey and returned to York, where two knights, the one a frenchman, the other an Italian challenged to fight within lists against Sir Iohn Cornwall, and Iames of Artois, which two strangers were overcome in battaile, and Sir Iohn Cornwall obtrayning the kings fauour, married the kings sister, that had been wife to Sir Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington.

Challenge of combat at York.

The Welchmen taking occasion by the kings absence when he was in Scotland, began to rebel, by the setting on of Owen Glendouerdew sonne to Griffith Vicham an Esquire of Wales, and so called Glendour, because his dwelling was in a place called Glendowry, for Glyn in Welch is a vale, and Dor is water, because the place was in a dale, at the side of the water or riuer of Dew in þ parish of Co:wen, in the countie of Merioneth in North Wales. He serued King Richard, at the time of his oppression by Henry Duke of Lancaster at Flint Castle.

The Welchmen rebell. Owen Glendouerdew.

The first cause of this strre was about a piece of land in controuersie betwixt him and the Lord Reignold Gray of Rushine, for when he saw his cause not fauoured, first he began to spole the lands of the said Lord Gray, whereof the king being certified, went with an army into Wales: but the Welchmen fled to the mountaines, the king brent the countrey, slew the people with whom he met, and returned with a great pray of cattell.

Besides the history of Oedipus and Iocasta, with the sieg of Thebes, translated and made into English verse, by Don Iohn Lidgate, a disciple of the said Chaucers.

John Gower a famous Poet.

Not long after deceased the like famous Poet Master Iohn Gower, a man not much unlike the other in excellency of wit, learning, or possessions, he builded a great part of St. Mary Queres Church in Southwarke, then newe redified. On the North side of the which Church, he prepared for his bones a resting place, where somewhat after the olde fashion he lyeth right sumptuously buried in a tombe of stone, with his image also of stone lying ouer him, þe haire of his head a wburne long to his shoulders, and curling vp, a final forked beard, and on his head a garland or Chaplet of roses red, foure in number, an habite of purple damasked downe to his feete, a Coller of Ewes gold about his necke, vnder his head the likenesse of thre booke, which he compiled: the first, Speculum meditantis in French, the second Vox clamantis in Latine, the third Confessio amantis in English, which last named booke is extant in print, þe second I haue faire witten, but the first I haue not seene, his tombe arched, was beautified with his armes, and the likenes of Angels with posies in latine. Besides in the

the wall were painted thre virgins crowned, one of the which was writtten Charity, and held this deuise. En toy qui filz de Dieu le pere sauné soit, qui gist sous ceste pierre. The second Mercie, with this deuise: O bon Iesu fait ta mercie alme dont le corps gist icy. The third Witte, with this deuise. Pour ta pite Iesu regard, Et met cest alme in saunegarde.

All which is now washed out, and the image defaced, by cutting off the nose and striking off his hands, because they were eleuated towards heauen.

The Emperour of Constantinople, came into England, to require ayde against the Turkes, whom the King with sumptuous preparation met at Blackheath, vpon S. Thomas day the Apostle, and brought him to London, and paying for the charges of his lodging, presented him with gifts worthy for one of so high degree.

Emperour of Constantinople came into England.

Some after came newes, that the King of Lero had slaine in battel Bassacko the son of the noble Balchazaradan, and destroyed Ierusalem, and all the country round about. And because he had by Gods grace so ouercome contrary to his opinion, he became christened and 60000. men of his sect.

The Emperour of Constantinople hearing this, was very glad, and departed out of England, being honoured by the King with precious giftes. A Parliament was holden at London, after the feast of the Epiphanie, in the which Parliament a statute was enacted for Lollards, that wheresoever they were knowen to preach their false and corrupt doctrine, (so termed at that time) they should be taken, & deliuered to the Bishop of the diocese, before whom, if they would presume stoutly to defend their erroneous opinions, they should be disgraced, & committed to the secular iurisdiction to be executed, which law was first put in practise vpon a Priest named Wil. Sawtry, which was burnt in Smithfield, in the presence of many a man. Simon Burley was restored in blood & inheritance, except the lands giuen to the abbey of Grace by the towre of London, to S. Stephans at Westminster, and the Friers at Langley.

The 8. day of Aprill deceased Thomas Beawchampe Earle of Warwick, and shortly after deceased John Botelsham Bishop of Rochester.

The five and twentieth day of July Isabel late wife to King Richard, not yet twelue yeeres of age, departed from Dover towards Caleis, and so into France to her father, well and honorably accompanied. Where when she was arrived, Huguenell that had ben sent for her into England, aduertised the commissioners then remaying at Bulloigne. She was conueyed from Caleis by the Englishmen that accompanied her to Lallingham, where the Earle of S. Paulinette her, and the French Ambassadors: she alighted from her horse beneath Lollingham, the French Ladies came to her, and brought her to the Chappell, before the Ambassadors of both Realmes, and there Sir Henry Percy protested, that the King of England his master had sent her to be deliuered to her father clears of all bonds of marriage, or otherwise, and that he would take it on his soule, that she was sound and intire, even as she was the same day she was deliuered to King Richard, and if any would say to the contrary, he was ready to proue it against him by combat, but the Earle of S. Paul, saying he believed it to be true, the Lord Percy took her by the hand

gainst King Henric.

Owen Glendouer dew with his Welchmen, wasted the lands of the Lord Reynald Gray, toke him prisoner, and slew many of his people.

Certaine men affirmed King Richard to be aliue, and that he should shortly shew himselfe openly, and reward them that were faithfull vnto him. But after a certaine priest was taken at Warwicke, who had written the names of many, which were the authoys of these troubles, both the hope and feare of this conspiracie vanished. The Priest was drawen, hanged and quartered. Also Walter Waldoche late Priour of Launde a Priorie in Leicestershire, because he confessed he knew cuil against the king and did concale it, was likewise hanged and headed. Moreover certaine gray friers were taken, of the which one Richard Friseby, Doctur of Divinitie, being asked what he would do if King Richard were present, answered, that he would fight in his quarrell against any man, euen to the death, wherefoze he was condemned, drawen, and hanged in his religious habite and weede.

At Daneburie in Essex, vpon Corpus Christi day, the deuill appeared in likeness of a gray frier, who entring the Church, raged insolently, to the great feare of the Parishoners: and the same houre with a tempest of whirlewind and thunder, the top of the Steeple was broken downe, and halfe the Chauncell scattered abroad.

Shortly

Shoortly after, Sir Roger Claringdon Knight, a bassard sonne of Edward the blacke Prince, and with him a Squire and a Peoman were beheaded, and eyght gray friers hanged and beheaded at London, and two at Leicester, all which had published King Richard to be alive. All Priories allians with their possessions were resumed and seized into the Kings hands, except such houses as were conventuals.

Owen Glendouderew, with a company of Welchmen invaded all the Shires that bordered nere unto him, wherfore Sir Edmond Mortimer with many knights and esquires went out to encounter with Owen, stronger then he was of the Country: but when it came to martiall assayes, their owne Archers turned their hands against them whom they should haue defended. There were slain aboute eleven hundred of our men. Sir Edmond Mortimer was taken, and the Welchwomen, when the battayle was done bing the dead carcasses too shamefully to be spoken, would not suffer them to be buried without great rancome. This battayle was fought at Melale in Wales. The King was not hasty to purchase the deliuerance of the Earle of March, because his title to the crowne was wel known, but suffered him to remaine in prison.

The King went with a great power into Wales to pursue Owen Glendouderew, where he profited nothing, but lost much, for the Welchmen conveyed themselves into unknown places: wherfore the king constrained by necessity, returned into England, after he had spoiled and burnt the country.

Edmond of Langley Duke of Yorke deceased, and was buried at Langley, with his brethren, nere unto his wife daughter to King Peter of Spaine.

The same time the Scottes cruelly entred into England, for they supposed all the Lords beyond Humber to be occupied in the parties of Wales: but the Earles of Northumberland, Henry Percy, and his sonne Henry with the earle of Dunbarre, (that a good while agoe hauing forsaken the Scottes, had sworn to be true to the King of England) with a number of armed men and plentie of archers, sodainely came to resist the Scottes, as they would haue returned home, after they had spoiled and burnt the Country: but now vpon a sodaine their way was foze laid, so that they must needs abide and take a place to fight vpon: they chose therefore a mountaine nere to the Towne of Wolloz, called Halydowne hill, in the which they place themselves with their armed men & archers, which when our men beheld, leauing the way in which they fode against the Scots, they clime the hill that fode ouer against the Scots, and without delay of time, our archers placed in the valley, set their arrowes against the Scots battell, that they might by some meanes force them to come downe: on the other side, the Scottish archers let lie at our men, who yet after they felt the grievous waight, and as it had ben a shower of tempest of the arrowes, shot by the Englishmen, they fledde. The Earle Dowglas persecuting his men so to flee, for he was their generall leader, toke his speare, and manfully with a multitude came downe the hill, trusting doublelesse in his armour and armour of his complices that had ben thre yeres in making, and forced himselfe to runne vpon the archers, which when the archers saw, they stepped backe, and shotte so fiercely, that they pierced the armed mens bodies, strooke through their helmets, riued their speares, and rent their armour with light adoe. Earle Dowglas himselfe was wounded in five places, the residue of the Scottes that were not come beside the hill, turning backe from the arrowes that flew, fledde away, but their flight nothing awayled them whilst the archers folloved them, but that they were compelled to peeld themselves. Earle Dowglas also was taken, and many drowned in the riuer of Tweede, whilst they knew not the swordes, to the number of five hundred (as was sayd.) In this battell no Lord, no knight, no esquire, gaue any stroke to the enemies, but onely God gaue the victorie to the English archers, the Lordes and armed men being onely lookers on.

That day the flower of the Scottish Chivalry was taken, to wit, the earle Dowglas, Mardake the eldest son of the Duke of Albanie, that was heire apparent to the Realme of Scotland: the earles of Murray, Angus, and Duketrey, the Lords of Mountgomerie, Erskyn, & Gram, with many other knights to the number of foure score, besides Esquires and yeomen, whose number was not knowne. There were slaine of barons, the Lord Gordon, the Lord John of Swinton that was false to both the Realmes, &c. This battell was fought on the fourteenth of September.

The messengers that had bin sent for Ioan, late wife to John of Mountford Duke of Bypaine returned with her into England, and landed at Falmouth in Cornewall. The King met with her at Winchester the seventh of February, where they were married in the Church of S. Swithen.

The 26. of February, she was crowned at Westminster.

In the summer following, by the Towne of Bedford and of Wyckesward, monstres were scene oftentimes mornings and eueninges to come out of the woodes, vnder diuers colours, in the likenesse and similitude of men of war, which met one with another, and seemed to fight cruell battels, which although they that were a farre off might see, yet they that were nere hand could not see nor finde, which thing deceiued many that coueted to appoach and come nere.

Henry Percy the ponger, did sodainely shewe himselfe to be the Kings enemy, vnto whom soynd Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, vncle to the said Henry: and to make their conspracte excusable, they did write vnto the shires about, that they pretended nothing against the allegiance nor fidelitie which they ought to the king, neither to gather to any other end an armie, but onely for the sauing of their persons, and for the better gouernement of the common wealth, because the payments and taskes granted to the king for the safe custodie die of the realme, were put to such vles as they ought not to be, and were vnprofitably consumed and wasted.

Moreouer, they complained: that because of the euill slaunders which their enemies had made of them, they durst not personally appeare in the kings presence, vntill the prelates and barons had intreated for them, that they might be permitted to purge themselves before the king, and be lawfully iudged by their peeres, so that many that saw these letters, did praise their diligence, and extoll their fidelitie towards the common wealth. But the king being disquieted with these doings, that he might appease the communalitie, he wrote to them, that he marvelled much, that seeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henry his son had receiued the most part of the payments and summes granted to him by the cleargy and communalitie, for the defence of the Marches of Scotland, what occasion they had to make such manifest slaunders &c. But the young Henry Percy putting his confidence in the aide of Owen Glendouer, and Edmond Mortimer Earle of March, with the Welchmen, and men of Cheshire, published that King Richard was alieue, and was with them, whom if any man would see, they should without delay come in armour vnto the Castle of Leicester, which declaration made diuers variable motions in the hearts of many, and caused them to wauer.

King Henry considering all things wisely, gathered together as many as he could, and came sodainly into the partes where the rebles kept their rage, and when Henry saw vpon a sodaine the kings banner, and was euen ready to haue scaled the towne of Shrewsbury, he straightwayes desisted from the assault of the towne, and said to his men, we must now needes turne our weapons vpon them that come against vs: we see the Kings standert, neither can we, though we would, seeke any Hartinghole: stand to it manfully therefore, for this day shall either bring vs all to promotion and honor, if we overcome, or else if we be overcome, it shall deliuer vs from the kings malice. For it is a more comly thing to die in battell for the common wealth, then after battell to die by the sentence of condemnation by the enemy: and with that, 14000. of the best men that were with Henry, made to we a promise to stand by him so long as breath would serue, and they toke the field that was commodious for them, and the king and his men lay in the field right against them. The bowmen of Henry Percy began y battel, whose arrowes fell not vpon the ground, but vpon the bodies of the kings souldiers, & the kings archers shot as fiercely against their enemies, so that on both sides many were slaine, and many thousands fled, thinking the King had been slaine: but the Earle of Dunbar withdrew the king from the place that he stood in, which was a good turne for him, for the aforesaid Henry Percy, and Earle Dowglas the Scot (then whom was neuer man more stout) raged so, that the kings standert was ouerthrowen, & those about it slaine, among whom was slaine Edmond Earle of Stafford, sir sides about five hundred slain. Henry the Prince was wounded in the face with an arrowe. In the meane season Henry Percy whilest he went before his men in the battel, pressing upon his enemies, was sodainly slain, which being knowne, the kings enemies fled, but the Earle Dowglas was taken, and also Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, with Sir Richard Vernon, and the baron of Kinderton, and many other were taken. This battel was fought on Mary Magdalens eue, nere vnto Shrewsbury, in a place called Old field, alias Bull field, not farre from a place called Barwike. On the Monday following were condemned and beheaded at Shrewsbury the Earle of Worcester, the Baron of Kinderton, and Sir Richard Vernon. The body of Henry Percy was deliuered to the Lord of Furniuaile to be buried, but the king caused the same body to be taken by, and to be reposed betwene two Millstones in the Towne of Shrewsbury, there to be kept with armed men, and afterward to be beheaded and quartered, commaunding his head and quarters to be carried vnto diuers Cities of the kingdome.

The Earle of Northumberland with a strong power was comming toward his sonne and his brother, (as men thought) or at the least towards the King; but the Earle of Westmerland, and Robert Waterton had gathered a great army, and had entred on their way to meete him sodainly, but he taking none of them both to be his friends, returned vnto the castle of Markworth.

When all things were set in a stay at Shrewsbury, the King went towards Poike, where, when he was settled, he sent to the Earle of Northumberland, commaunding him to dismisse his company, and to come to him, and the Earle at the Kings commaundement came to him on the morowe after Saint Laurence day, but the King receiued him not friendly, but as one that sued for pardon, and pardoning him of his life, committed him to safe custodie.

A Parliament
at London, and a great raife.

In a parliament holden at London after the Octaues of the Epiphantie, the Earle of Northumberland was restored to his former estate and dignitie. And in this Parliament was granted vnto the King an vnaccustomed taske, very beaule and painefull for the inhabitants, the manner of which taske the gran-fers thereof would haue to be kept secret for euermore: and vnder that condition only it was granted, that it should not be any example to them that should come after, and that there should remaine no recozd thereof, but the same should with to be burnt.

The Frenchmen about that time came befoze the Ile of Wight with a great Raup, and sent certaine of their men to demand in the name of king Richard, and of Quene Isabell, a tribute or subsidie of the inhabitants: who answered, that king Richard was dead, and the Quene, sometime his wife, was sent home to her parents, without condition of any tribute: but if the Frenchmens minde were to fight, they willed them to come vp, and no man should let them for the space of sixe houres to refresh themselves, but when that time was expired, they should haue battell giuen them, which when the Frenchmen heard, they went away and did nothing.

The olde Countesse of Arfozd, mother to Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland (who as we said befoze died at Louaine) did cause such as were familiar with her, to bryte throughout all the parts of Essex, that King Richard was aaine, and that he should shortly come and chalenge his olde estate and dignitie. She caused many harts of siluer, and some of golde to be made for badges, such as King Richard was wont to bestowe on his knights, Esquires and friends, that distributing them in the kings name, she might the sooner allure the knights, and other valiant men of the Country, to be at her will and desire.

Also, the same and bryte which daily was blazed abroad by one William Serle, sometimes of King Richards chamber, that the same King Richard was in Scotland, and tarried with a power of French and Scottishmen, caused many to beleue that he was aaine. The Archbishop to the King.

About the feast of S. Iohn Faith, the King called a parliament at Conuentry, and sent proceesse to the Sheriffes that they should chose no knights nor burgeses that had any knowledge in the Lawes of the Realme, by reason whereof, it was called the Lay mens Parliament. These picked out knights and Burgesles, could deuise none other way to releue the Kings lacke of money, but to depriue the Cleargie of their temporall landes and goods, by this occasion giuen, arose great alteration and variance betwene the Cleargie and the laytie. The knights affirming that they had oftentimes going forth with the King against rebels and enemies, not onely spent largely their goods, with and for the King, but also had set their boddes in great danger and leopards, where in the meane season the Clearkes sate idle at home, and helped the King neuer a whit. But Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterbury made answer, that the cleargie did alwayes giue the King as much as the lay people did, considering that they did oftner giue the King tenths, then the laytie gaue sixtēnes. And moreover, that more of their tenants did serue the King in his warres, then of the tenants of the lay fē. And besides this, they prayed day and night for the prosperitie of the King, and of al them that faithfully serued him.

And when the speaker of the parliament named Iohn Cheyney, said with a loude voyce & angry countenance, that he little regarded the prayers of the Church, the Archb. of Canterbury answered: Wh (quoth he) now I perceiue plainly to what end the fortune of this realme wil come, when the sufferges of the church are excluded and little set by, where with the godhead is wont to be appealed: surely that kingdome neuer continueth firme and stable, that is voyde of prayer and deuotion: notwithstanding, thou which settest at naught the religion of the Clergie, thinke not without punishment to take away the possessions of the church, for if the Archbishop of Canterbury line, thou shalt haue euil taking of any thing that is his. When the archbishop considering that the king did winke at these things, rose vp, and knoēd downe befoze the king, desiring him to consider how gratically, & by Gods fauor, he had attained the kingdome, that he would consider his first promise, which was, that he would preferue vnto euery man their right & title so far as lay in him. He also willed him to remember y<sup>e</sup> oth which he voluntarily made, which was, that he would honor and defend the church, and would cherish and maintaine the ministers thereof: he required him to consider the danger and dishonour of breaking an oth, wherefoze he desired him to permit and suffer the church to enioy the priuiledges

inledges and libertie, which in time of his predecessors it did enjoy, and to feare that king, by whom all kings do raigne. When the Archbishop had said these and like words, the king commaunded him to go againe to his seat, and said, that his intent and purpose was to leave the Church in as good state or better then he found it. And then the Archbishop speaking to the knights and burgeses, said: You, and such like as you be, haue giuen such counsell vnto our king, and to his predecessors, to confiscate the goods & lands of the Celles which the Frenchmen and Romans did possesse in England, and said, that by them he should heape by great riches, as indeed they were worth many thousands of golde. Notwithstanding, it is most true that the king at this day is not the richer thereby of halfe a Marke; for you haue extorted; or at the least begged them out of his hands, and haue appropriated the said goods vnto your selues, so that it may be coniectured that your request to haue our temporalities, is not for the kings profit, but for your owne couetousnesse: for without doubt, if the king (as God forbid he should) fulfill your wicked purpose, he should not be one farthing the richer the next yeere following: and surely, I will sooner let my head be cut off, then that the Church should be destitute of the least right that pertaineth to it.

Again to the knights and burgeses.

The knights of the Parliament hearing this saying of the Archbishop, and seeing the constancie of their Metropolitane, held their peace, but yet persisted in minde to haue their purpose: which the Archbishop perceiving (having his eye on eche side to marke what was done) laboured so to disappoint their doings, that he wanne the fauour of certaine of the temporal Lords to assist him, who constantly auouched by their consents, that the Church should neuer be spoiled of the temporalities. And here they acquite the Archbishoppe and Prelates, one pleasure for another, which they had done for them before. When the commons in this Parliament required that all such landes and reuenues as sometime belonged vnto the Crowne, and had bene giuen away, eyther by the king, or by his predecessors king Edward or Richard, should againe bee restored vnto the Crowne. Vnto which request the Archbishop and other the Prelates would in no case condescend: and so it came to passe, that there was no more mention made after wards of any exactions of the temporalities. But contrariwise, the knights of the Parliament, who had thewed themselves so importunate in that errour, confessed vnto the Archbishop their fault and malice, desiring him to forgive them.

Whereouer they gaue him thanks, for that through his stout courage the Church at that time recovered strength, rectifying the saying of the Ethnike, Thou vnder an hard Prince, and an euill time, art bolder to do good. Besides many things that were granted to the king in this Parliament, the lay people granted him two sixtens upon condition, that the Lord Furniwall should receive all the money, and see it to be spent in the kings warres.

Two sixtens granted to the king.

Also the Letters patents that were giuen to sundry persons, for yeerely renewes by king Edward, and king Richard, were called in againe, the knights of the Parliament so aduocating it, although it redounded to the kings dishonour. The Cleergy granted the king a tenth and a halfe.

A tenth and a halfe granted to the king.

armour, and munited with men, onely for feare of the King whom he coulde not safely come vnto to speake; but his purpose (he said) was good and common both for the King and the Realme, if happily they would know it: and then he shewed a Scedale, in which the Articles were contayned, which when the Earle of Westmerland had read, hee with word and countenance praised the Bishops holy and vertuous intent, and promised, that hee and his would prosecute the same with the Archbishop.

The Archbishop being glad of this, beleued the Earles wordes, and perswaded the Earle Marshall, being vnwilling thereunto, to go with him to a place appointed to talke together, to whom they with like number came, and the writing with the Articles was read ouer: straightway the Earle and they that were with him gaue their assent to these articles: then said the Earle being subtiller than the rest, behold the labour that we haue taken in hand is come to such ende as we would haue it, and the people hath now bene long in armour, let some of your men beare word vnto the people to go their way home, and to lay downe their armour, and euery man to fall to his occupation and accustomed labour: in the meane season, we, in token of concord wil drinke together, that the people on both sides shall see it, and without delay, after they hat taken each other by the hands, a knight was sent on the Archbishops behalfe, to beare word to the people that it was peace, and to commaund euerie man to lay downe their armour, and to go to their owne home.

The people beholding signes of peace, and the Lords drinke together, being wearied with the vnaccustomed trauell of warre, turned the reines of their hildes home wards, and so it came to passe, that when the people of the Archbishops side went away, the number of the aduersaries increased, as befoze it was appointed, and the Archbishop did not perceiue that he was betrayed, untill such time as the Earle arrested him: hee arrested the Marshall also, and many other with him, to all which it was promised that they should haue no harme, but that promise was not kept, for both the Archbishop and the Earle Marshall were brought to Pontfract to the King, who in the meane while was aduanced thither with his power, and from thence he went to Poike, whither the prisoners were also brought: others say that the king sojourning at Bishops Thorpe, the Archbishop was brought thither, where sir William Fulford knight learned in the lawes, sitting on an high stage in the Hall, gaue iudgement that the Archbishop should be beheaded: he was therefore set on an ill fauoured iade, with his face towards the horse taylor, and carried with great scozne and shame enough to a fildie there beside, where with five strokes his head was smitten off on the morrow after Whitsonday: with him were condemned and executed the Earle Marshall, sir Iohn Lamplough, and sir Robert Plumpton. After the king had ransomed and otherwise punished by greiuous fines the Citizens of Poike, he departed from Poike with an army of 37000. fighting men furnished with all prouision, marching northward against the Earle of Northumberland. At his coming to Durham the L. Hastings, the L. Falconbridge, sir Iohn Colville of the Dale, and sir Iohn Griffith, being consulted of the conspiracie, were Pestilence.

This summer, through corruption of the ayre, so great a plague was shed vpon mens bodies, as was not sene the like in many yeres in this lande, so that men might say:

The south winds warme did blow, with heat pestiferous,
And pestilence did beare great rule in Cities populous.

For at London in short while it consumed about 30000. men and women, and in the countrey toynes great mortalitie fell among the husbandmen, so that great households died cleane vp, and the houses were emptied.

In time of this pestilence the King durst not come nere to the Citie of London, wherefoze being at the Castell of Leedes in Kent, he departing from, thence, toke shipping at Quinborough in the Isle of Sheppey, to sayle ouer into Essex, and so to go to Plassey, there to passe the time till the mortality were ceased. But as the king was on the sea, certaine French Pirates which lay lurking at the Thames mouth to watch for some pray, got knowledge of the kings passage, and thereupon as he was in the midst of his course, they entred amongst his flæte and toke foure vessels next to the kings shippe, and in one of the same vessels sir Thomas Rampton, the kings vicechamberlaine, with all his chamber stuffe and apparrell. They followed the king so néere, that if his ship had not bene swift, he had landed soner in Fraunce, than in Essex: But such was his good hap that he escaped, and arriued at his appointed port.
there

About the sixteenth day of August deceased, sir Robert Knowles knight, at his manour of Sconethorpe in Norfolk, he was brought to London, and there honourably buried by the Lady Constance his wife, in the white Friers Church which he had newly redified and builded.

Sir Robert Knowles.
John Leiland.

This sir Robert Knowles had bene a most valiant Captaine in the warres of France, during the raigne of Edward the third, and Richard the second, whose force the Realme of France both felt and feared, so did the Dukedome of Brytaine, and all the people from hence to Spayne. Of him in his life were made verses in Latin, which may be englished thus.

Register of Bermondsey.

O Robert Knowles, most worthy of fame,
By thy prowess France was made tame:
Thy manhood made the Frenchmen to yeeld,
By dint of sword in towne and field.

Verses.

This sir Robert Knowles founded in the towne of Pontfract a Colledge to the honour of the holy Trinitie, with an Hospitall ioyned thereunto. In the which Colledge was placed a Paister, and sixe or seuen Priestes, and in the Hospitall 13. poor men and women. He was once minded to haue made this Colledge at his manour of Sconethorpe, but at the request of Constance his wife (a woman of meane birth, and sometime of a dissolute life afoze her marriage) he turned his purpose, and made it in the very place of Pontfract, where she was borne, endowing the same with 180. pound land by yere. He also builded the faire new great bridge at Rochester, ouer the riuer of Medeway, with a Chappell and a Chauntry at the east ende thereof. In the which Chappell was sometime a table hanging, wherein was noted the benefactors to that bridge, as followeth.

All these had giuen money or lands towarde the building and repaying of the said bridge.

Notwithstanding this table, I finde in recozd as folloiweth: The bridge betwixt the Citie of Rochester, and the village of Strode was in the fourth yere of king Richard the second, soze decayed or broken downe by tempest of weaether, and inundation of the riuer of Medway, whereupon William Basing Master of the hospitall at Strode, and Nicholas Hering, were licensed by the King to repaire the same. And in the eleuenth yere of the same king Richard the second, Iohn Cobham, and Robert Knowles beganne their charge towarde the building of the said bridge, and in the eightene yere of the same Richard, the said Iohn Cobham founded a Chantry in the Chappel there of thre Chapleins, and gane lands to the bridge in the 22. yere of Richard the second: and thus much of the recozd haue I noted.

This Robert Knowles, was also one of the founders of an hospitall in the Citie of Rome, in manner following: for that there was no station of the world, but had some kinde of hospitalitie in Rome, saue onely the people of England, certaine Englishmen beeing in Rome, procured licence of the Pope to build an hospitall, in place where Thomas Becker Archbishoppe of Canterbury had sometime builded a Chappell of the holy Trinitie. In this hospitall which they builded, was to be releued, a gentleman thre daies, bread, wine, and ware: a commoner eight daies and nightes, meate, drinke, and lodging. And if any woman happen to be nigh her time of deluerance, so that she dare not take her iourney, she to be honestly kept till she be purified: and if she be of power, to take her childe with her: if not, to be kept there untill it were seven yeres old.

The founders of this hospitall were, sir Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London, Thomas Brampton Bishoppe of Rochester, sir Iohn Philpot and his wife, sir Robert Knowles, sir Hugh Calueley, sir Iohn Haukewood, sir Iohn Thornam, Knights, Iohn Twiforde, Iohn Shepard and Alice his wife, Robert Cristall and Agnes his wife, Robert Windleront, Walter Whithers, Robert at Pyne, Adam Staple, Henry Line Draper, and other Citizens of London in the yere of our Lord 1380. in the Reigne of King Richard the second: which Hospitall was againe newe reedified and made a goodly house in the yere of our Lord 1449. towards the charges whereof, was money gathered in euery Parish in Englande, but that came to small effect, the charges of collecting and conueying was such, that, there came towards the woork not past one thousande Duckettes in one whole yere.

In November a Parliament being called at London, a tax of money was leuied of the whole Realme. Parliament at London.

This yere was a soze and sharpe winter, and such aboundance of snow, which continued December, Ianuarie, Februarie and March, so that almost all small birds dyed through hunger and cold. Whiles the King held a great Councell at London with the Nobles of the Realme, Henry Earle of Pomerleland, and Thomas Lord Bardolfe came againe into England, who after long iourneying, when they came to the Towne of Thristle, they caused to be proclaymed, that who so would haue libertie, should take vp armour and weapon and follow them, whereupon much people resorted to them: but sir Thomas Rockley Sherife of Pomerleland, with other Knights of that countrey went against them, and at Bramham More nere to Haleswold, fought with them a great battell, and slue the Earle, whose head was straight waies cut off. The Lord Bardolfe was sore wounded and taken alieue, but died shortly after. This battell was fought on the xviij day of february. The Earles head was put on a stake, and carried openly through the Citie of London, and set on London bridge. The Bishoppe of Bangor was taken with the Lords, but pardoned of his life, because he was not found in armour. The King went to Poike, and there condemned such as transgressed, confiscated their goods, pacified the countrey, hanged the Abbot of Waple, who had bene in armour, and returned to the south partes againe.

Upon the sequenth of September there were such floods of rayne, as the olde men of that age had neuer sene before. Edmond Holland Earle of Kent whilest hee besieged the Castell of Briake in Britaine, he was wounded with an arrow of a Crossebow in the head, notwithstanding he toke the Castell and destroyed it to the ground, and not long after his braines rotted, and he died.

Spillan hauing no issue by her husband, was now moued by the king, after her husbands death to marry with his bastard brother, the Earle of Dorset, but she chose for her husband, Henry Mortimer, a goodly young Bachelor, by whom she had issue Anne married to sir Iohn Aubemond.

About the feast of All-Saints the Cardinals of Burges came into England, being sent from the Colledge of Cardinals, to enforme the King and Cleargie of the vncōstant dealing of Pope Gregory, as also he had informed the French King and his Cleargy and Realme, to the ende that those two kings might set to their helping handes, to induce the saide Gregory to obserue the oath he had made, and that by the magnificence of those two kings, concord might be made in the Church, vnto the which businesse the French king had gladly granted, and sent messengers vnto Pope Gregory, who notwithstanding was obstinate.

The King of England when he vnderstode the Cardinall's message, he commaunded that courtesie and gentle entertainment should be giuen him, and offered to beare his charges so long as he would abide in England.

409. The King with his Quene kept their Christmasse at Eltham in Kent.

After the feast of the Epiphany, the Archbishop of Canterbury caused to assemble at London, all the Cleargy of the Realme, to whose personages miȝte to go to the generall councill holden at Pisa, whereunto were chosen Robert Holam Bishop of Salisbury, Henry Chiseley Bishop of Saint Dauids, and Thomas Chillingdon Bp̄ of Christes Church in Canterbury, and the king had sent before Iohn Coluile knight, and master Nicholas Rixton Clerkes, with letters to be giuen to them. And in the letter to the Pope it was written.

King Henry
writeth to the Pope.

Most holy Father, our humble recommendations in filiall wise premisses. The inscrutable wisdome of the high God doth sometime dissemble in some sort, the sinnes of men, if at length they will yet amend, though not through seruile feare, but by their filiall conscience mouing or pricking them. And how much the longer he deferrēth his yre in this life, so much the more grievously will he punish in the life to come, as is to be feared. We therefore in our mindes resoluing the long, and as it were the inueterate Schisme now in the Church of God being very hotte, truly we feare, as by likely hode is to be feared, that it ought to be imputed to all Princes of the Christian Religion before God and man, vnto a slouthfull negligence, the cruelty of such an error, nourished thus long: Therefore specially because the Cleargie of euerie kingdome, eyther feare, or the blindnesse of auarice causing them, doe couer this wicked Schisme vnder the beyle of deuotion, and holinesse, so that those Princes, to whom the materiall sword is committed, for the defence and safegarde of the Church, about this foresaid Schisme, to be utterly extirped, they neyther got about to shewe any great instance of courteous perswasion, nor to put in practise the sword for the purpose. Whereupon, hauing heard often-tūnes of many, and vnderstand

now a god while agone by letters of the most reuerend in Christ, our fathers the L. Cardinall of your Colledge, and by the report of the reuerend in Christ, the Lord Cardinall of Bourdeaux our friend, worthily beloued on the behalfe of the Colledge, comming to the presence of vs, and of our first begotten sonne the Prince of Wales, and of the prelates and priors of our Realme, how that not onely hee, but also the Cardinall of your said Colledge, by occasion of the continuance of this schisme, contrary vnto the bolue and othe made by your holinesse, to renounce the papacie, haue withdrawnne from you all their obedience, and doe determine to holde a generall counsell in the feast of the Annunciation of our Lady nowe nerte to come at the Citie Pisa, a place indede fit, as it is said, and honest, and by your holinesse commended for mete and conuenient, as it is affirmed, that this may bee done, especially by force of a certaine obligation for occasion of the schisme to bee extirped by your holinesse, whilist you were yet in minority, of your owne accord, and solemnly entred or made in the conclaue with the Cardinall aforesaid, and after that you were receiued to the papall dignitie, by the subscription of your holy hands, openly reuoked and confirmed, as by the viewe of a certaine publike instrument befoze vs and the states abovesaid exhibited it plainly, as hath to vs appeared, not knowing how the vniou of the Church may be come vnto by any other way more commodiously. Whereupon the sayde Cardinall hath requested vs, vpon consideration of the premises, and other reasonable causes by him openly exprest, and in the same letters euidently comprehended, which indede greatly moued both the consciences of vs, and of the said states, that we should take care to employ our counsell and ayde about the premises, to the said Colledge, for the respect of the goble zeale and loue which thereto we beare, together with other catholike Princes, and that wee should send our Ambassadors and prelates of our Realme by themselves, or by procurators to the said counsell. We therefore, desirous to shew the zeale and intent which we beare and haue to the same vniou, and nothing with more hede the wholesome and holy intention of the same Colledge in the premises, as other Princes doe note the same, as we here at this present, willing also, so farre as in vs lieth to the honour of God, and that we may auoyde the sworde edge of his wrath, to doe our partes about the reformation of the same state of the Church, hauing taken with our said sonne, and also with the prelates and nobles aforesaid, ripe deliberation, we beseech with all humilitie, and in the bowelles of Iesus Christ, exhorting, doe require your clemencie, whose state and honour vpon diuers causes as a deuout sonne of the Church, so farre as with God we might, we haue euer embraced, and doe embrace by the expresse and whole assent of the states aforesaid, that as well for the auoyding of the manifest slander of the Church, as of the Apostolike see, and for the desirefull conseruation of your estate and honour, and also for the desire of the faithfull procurators that will come to the said place and day together, and with all quietnesse, for the respect of him specially that giueth grace to the humble, that we will vouchsafe to be present at the day and place before mentioned, in the spiritte of humblenesse, to fulfill the vow together, and such manner oth effectually, as we trust you will. For we hold for certaine, that, as we are informed, the Cardinals of both Colledges haue come together in one and the same consonancie of minde about the premises, and as it were all the Princes Christians set forth themselves with glad mindes in their fauour and ayde, howsoeuer they seeke from else-where starting holes, the same Cardinals by Gods helpe assisting them, shall obtaine the effect of such an vnion: neyther doth it seeme to vs, or to the inhabitants of our Realme expedient, that we should disagree from other Catholike princes in so holy a purpose in any thing, but rather that we should cause our Ambassadors and Prelates of our Realme by themselves or their procurators, as we beleeue that other will do the like, that the vniuersall Church may be nourished with the pleasant taste of a wishfull vnion. Moreover, most blessed father, if the prouidence of the Apostolike sea would vouchsafe to attend and marke, what great harme & danger is sprung by throughout the whole world, not onely of bodies, but also of soules, redeemed by Christs blood, haue hitherto chanced vnder pretence of the continuation of the said Schisme, and specially the slaughter of Christian people, which aboue the number, as men say, of two hundred thousand are perished by the raging of diuers warres that haue risen in sundrie partes of the world, and enen now of late, to the number of thirtie thousand, which (by reason of the dissention had vpon the Bishopricke of Lige betwixt the two which doe strue and contende, the one in the authoritie of the true Pope, and the other by the authoritie of the antipope) were in slaughter fieldes (a lamentable thing to be spoken) slayne and destroyed. Truly, the Apostolike sea would be in great heavinesse of heart, and would rather forsake the honour of the Apostolicall sea, than then to see from henceforth such wicked slaughter to be committed, and would take example of the true mother, who before King Salomon, rather chose to giue place, than that the childe should be cut in peeces. And albeit by the creation of the nine Cardinals, against your oath (that we may vse other mens words) lastly by you made, of the which Act a vehement cause of admiration is rayled, it may in some wise be presumed, that as is like to be thought, your intention doth not brende to the ende of extirping the Schisme, yet God forbid that your holinesse should circumspectly be noted of such inconstancie of minde by any manner of person, whereupon the last error may be accounted worse than the first, not onely to be execrated of euery Christian soule, but also to be expulled with all indignour. These things which we write, of a pure heart and vnfained faith doe procede: and therefore (benigne father) if it please you, let these things with due consideration be weyed (most blessed father) let him incline your heart, and corroborate the same in this holy worke, happily to be executed, who for peace sake, when he was the King of all, endured the forme of a seruant. Written vnder our Signet, in our palace at Westminster, the 12. day of November.

Thus hau. I set downe the Epistle which the king sent to the Pope, that it may may appeare vnto all men how modestly he attempted to induce the Pope to perfoyme his vow and oath, to the end the fault should not appere to be in him, that the vniity of the Church was not reformed.

According to appointment the Cardinals of both Colledges, to wit, of Gregory, and of Benner met at Pisa, effectually to intreat of the reformation of agreement, where almost all the Bishops of the whole Latin world, met together, and honourable men were elected to helpe the Cardinals in this case, who calling for the grace of the holy spirit, agreed in one, and chose one to be head of the Church, refusing the other two, and called his name Alexander the first, and reiected both Gregory and Benedict.

This yere was a great play at the Skinners well, nere vnto Clearkenswell besides London, which lasted eight daies. & was of matter from the creation of the world: there were to see the same, the most part of the nobles and gentles in England: and forthwith after began a royall iustling in Smithfield, betwene the Earle of Somerset and the Seneschall of Penalt, sir Iohn Cornwall, sir Richard of Arundel, and the son of sir Iohn Cheyney against other Frenchmen.

Thomas Bewfort knight sonne to Iohn of Gaunt was made Chancelloz, and Henry Scroope was made Treasurer.

Owen Glendouer dew, though he was pardoned by the king at the request of David Holbech Esquire: yet being now diuenc to such misery, that in manner despairing of all comfort, he fled into desert places, and solitary caues, where being destitute of all reliefe and succour, dreadding to shew his face to any creature, and finally, lacking to sustaine nature, for pure hunger miserably pined away and died.

In a Parliament holden at London, in the Lent season, the knights and burgesses presented to the king a bil in this forme: To the most excellent Lord the king, and all the Nobles in this present Parliament assembled, your faithfull commons humbly do shew, that our Soueraigne Lord the king may haue the tempoꝛall possessions and lands, which by the Bishops, Abbots, and Priors are proudly spent and wasted in this Realme, which would suffice to find 150. Carles, 1500. Knights, 6000. Esquires, and 100. hospitals more than now be, &c. But when they went about to declare out of what places these great summes were to be leuied, wherby the foresaid states should be endowed, they wanted in their account: wherefoze the king commanded them, that from thenceforth they should not presume to moue any such matter.

Sir Robert Umfreuile viceadmirall of England annoyed the countreies on the sea coastes of Scotland: for comming into the Frith with tenne ships of warre and lying there fourtene daies together, landing euery day on the one side of the riuer, or on the other, taking prizes, spoiles, and prisoners, notwithstanding the Duke of Albany, and the Earle Douglas were ready there with a great power to resist him: he brent the Galiot of Scotland, being a ship of great account, with many other vessels lying the same time at the Blacknes, ouer against Lithe. At his returne from thence, he brought with him 14. good ships, and many other great prizes of clothes, both wollen and linnen,

This yere king Henry founded a Colledge at Battaille field in Shropshire, in the place where he ouercame sir Henry Percy and other, suppressed the second of Edward the first, valued by the yere fiftie foure pounds, two shillings and two pence,

Iohn Prendergest knight, and William Long, kept the seas from Pirates and Routers, so that the passage by sea was quiet, but by the ill willers they were accused of theft and robbery themselves, whereupon the knight toke Sanctuary at Westminster, where he could not haue an house or cottage to hide his head, for that the same was forbidden by the king, so that he was forced to lie in a tent which he set vp in the Church porch, and to haue men to watch him in the night season, for feare of his enemy: but his fellow William remained on the sea, untill the Admirall had prepared ships readie, and went in person to fetch him, which he could not do, till he promised him by his fidelitie, that he should haue no harme, which promise notwithstanding, William was imprisoned in the Tower of London.

The Duke of Burgoyne, whom the French king, and his eldest sonne, called the gouernour of France, fauoured, seeing that the contrary part was very strong, sent ambassadours into England, desiring the kings aide against the Duke of Orleans, and promised many things, amongst the which, he promised his daughter in marriage to the Prince, and a great summe of gold with her. To whom the king answered: We aduertise you not to fight with your enemy in this case, who iustly seemeth to bere you, for the death of his father by you procured: but as much as in you lieth, endeavour your selfe to mitigate the young mans wrath, and promise to make him reasonable satisfaction according to the aduise of your friends. And if then he will not cease from persecuting you, get you in to the strongest place of your dominion, and there gather such power as may be able to put off his force. If then after this, he will make warre against you, you shall haue the iust occasion to fight with him, and in such case, we will shew you such fauour, as ye haue demanded. Thus there were sent sent ouer to his aide Thomas Earle of Arundell, Gilbert Vmframuaile Earle of Angus, or Earle of Hymre, sir Robert Vmframuaile uncle to the said Gilbert, sir John Oldcastle, Lord of Cobham, sir John Grey, and William Porter with twelue hundred archers, they toke shipping at Douer, and landed at Cluce, from whence they went to Arras, where they found the Duke of Burgoyne, of whom they were ioyfully receiued, and from thence he appointed them to Haroune, where he assembled a power of his owne subiectes, marched toward Arras, and so to Marguison, where he lodges his Flemings. The Duke of Brabant had thirty thousand fighting men, drawing towards him, and laide siege about one part thereof, there were many skirmishes, but finally they within the Towne abandoned it, and the Flemings destroyed it. From thence the Duke went to Beolle, and it was destroyed euen as it were in passing by it, from thence they went befoze Roy in Vermondois, which yielded to them, from thence to Pontiden, &c. The Duke of Burgoyne went to Arras, from thence to Roy, from thence to Bietou, and after to Beauuais, the Earle of Arundell was with him in his ayde with five hundred Englishmen, from thence he went to Poitoulle, from thence to Meulent, and so to Paris. The Duke of Brabant was lodged at Saint Dionis, and at Saint Clow, with a great power. About the tenth of Nouember, John Duke of Burgoyne issued out of Paris, and went to Saint Clow, where putting his people in order, the Earle of Arundell and his people made a great assault, so that they within were driuen to yield to the will of the English men, wherefoze they were bountifully rewarded by the Duke of Burgoyne, and then returned into England.

King Henry created his brother Thomas Bewfort, Earle of Dorset, and his sonne Thomas of Lancaster that was steward of England and Earle of Armarle, he created Duke of Clarence.

A squire of Wales named Rice ap Dee, which had long time rebelled against the King, was brought to London, and there drawn, hanged and quartered.

After the feast of All-saints, a Parliament was begun at London. The king caused a new kind of Nobles to be made, which were of lesse value then the olde by fower pence in the Noble, so that fiftie Nobles should wate a pound Troy weight.

Edward Duke of Yorke this yere began the foundation of the Colledge of Fodringhey in Northamptonshire, for a master, twelue priests, eight Clerkes, and thirtene Choristers, Henry the fift gaue landes thereunto, of Ppoyz aliens by him suppressed, and mougt dispend yere (as was valued at the suppression) fower hundredeth and ninetene poundes, eleuen shillings.

John Duke of Burgoyne, hauing now the government, both of the French King and of his Realme, he so persecuted the Duke of Brabant and his complices, that at the last, the saide Duke Charles, was forced to sende into Englande certaine persons, as his procuratours, to offer in his name vnto King Henry, and to his sonnes, certaine conditions, which were concluded the eight day of May. The said Charles Duke of Mollance besought the King of England to send vnto him 8000. men to aide him against the Duke of Burgoyne and his complices, which daily procured the French King to make war vpon them.

King Henry courteously entertained the messengers, and vpon consideration had of their offers, which seemed to make greatly both for his honour and profite, as Duke of Guyen, he tooke vpon him to succour and defend them against all men, as their Lord and soueraigne, and so sending away the messengers, promised to send them aide very shortly.

King Henry
mind'd a boy-
age into France.

When said the King to the Archbishop of Canterburie, Lord Chancelloz, do you not see howe the Almighty hath disposed for vs, beholde now the acceptable time, let vs goe into France, to winne with small adoe, that which is our right: And surely it was thought he would haue recovered France, at that time, if strength of body had bene answerable to his minde, but being oppressed with great sickness he could not endure, neither to go nor ride, yet he commaunded all those to come to him that held of him by knightes seruice, as if he had meant to go ouer the sea, but the Lords of the Realme perswaded him to commit that iourney vnto his second sonne Thomas.

T. Otborne.

In the meane time Henry the Prince, sonne to the king, offended with certaine of his fathers family, which were said to solue discord betwixt the father and the sonne, he wrote vnto all the parts of the Realme, endeuouring himselfe to rescall all the practises and imaginations of such detractors, and slanderous people, and to make the matter moze manifest to the world, he came to the king his father about the feast of Peter and Paule, with such a number of his friends and wellwillers, as a greater had not bene scene in those daies. He was straightwaies admitted to his fathers presence, of whom this one thing he besought him of, that if such as had accused him might be conuicted of vnjust accusation, that they might be punished, not according to their deserts, but yet after their lies were proued against them, they might somewhat taste of that which they had meant, although not to the uttermost: to the which request the King seemed to graunt, but he tolde him, that he must tarry a Parliament, that such might be tried and punished by iudgement of their peeres. Thus farre Thomas Otborne. To the same effect (but in moze ample manner) writeth the translator of Titus Liuius (who wrote an history of Henry the fift, and dedicated it to Henry the sixt,) as he was informed by the Earle of Oymond, an eye witnesse of the same, as followeth: During the sickness of the King (saith he) some euill disposed people laboured to make dissention betwene the King, and the prince his sonne, by reason whereof, and by the Aides of youth which he exercised moze then meancly, and for the great recourse of people vnto him, of whom his Court was at all times moze abundant than his fathers, the King suspected that he would presume to vsurpe the Crowne, he being aliue, which suspicious fealonie was occasion, that he in part withheld his affection, and singular loue from the Prince: but when the Noble Prince was aduertised of his fathers fealonie, and mistrust, by some his secret friends of the Kinges counsaile,

counsaile, he disguised himselfe in a goyne of blue satten, or damaske, wrought full of oplet holes, and at euery oplet the neede wherewith it was made, hanging still by the silke: and about his arme hee wore a dogges collar set full of S.S. of golde, and the tircets of the same also of fine golde. Thus strangely apparelled, with a great company of Lords, and other Noble men of his court, he came to the King his father, who at that time lay at Westminster, where at his coming (by commaundement of him) not one of his company aunounced himselfe further then the fire in the hall, notwithstanding that they were greatly and ofte desired to the contrarie, by the Lords and great estates of the Kings Court: and this they did not onely because the weather was colde, but because the Prince had so commaunded them, to giue the lesse occasion of mistrust to the King his father, but hee himselfe onely accompanied of the Kings household passed forth to the King his father, to whom (after due salutation) he desired to shew the intent of his minde in secret manner. When the King caused himselfe to be bozne in his chaire into his secret chamber (because he was diseased and might not goe) where in the presence of three or foure persons, in whom the King had most confidence, he commaunded the Prince to shewe the effect of his minde: When the Prince kneeling downe before his father, said to him these words, Most redoubted Lord and father, I am this time come to your presence, as your liegeman, and as your sonne naturall, in all things to obey your grace as my soueraigne Lord and father. And whereas I vnderstand ye haue mee suspect of my behauiour against your grace, and that ye feare I would vsurpe your crowne against the pleasure of your highnesse, of my conuersation your grace knoweth that if ye were in feare of any man, of what estate soeuer he were, my dutie were to the endangering of my life to punish that person, thereby to ease that soze from your heart: and then how much rather ought I to suffer death to bring your grace from the feare that ye haue of me that am your naturall sonne, and your liegeman. And to that intent I haue this day by confession of my finnes and receiuing the Sacrament, prepared my selfe, and therefore most redoubted Lord and father, I beseech you in the honour of God, for the easing of your heart, heretofoze your knes to flea me with this dagger, and at that worde with all reuerence hee deliuered to the King his dagger, saying, my Lord and father, my life is not so desirous to me, that I would liue one day that should bee to your displeasure, no: I couet not so much my life as I doe your pleasure and welfare, and in your thus doing, here in the presence of these Lords, and tofoze God at the day of iudgement I clarely forgiue you my death. At these words of the Prince, the King taken with compassion of heart, cast from him the dagger, and embracing the Prince kissed him, & with effusion of teares said vnto him, My right deere and hartily beloued sonne, it is of truth that I had you partly suspect, and as I now perceiue, vnderferued on your partie: but seeing this your humilitie and faithfulness, I shall neither slay you, no: from henceforth haue you any moze in mistrust, for no report that shall be made vnto me, and thereof I assure you vpon mine honour. John Prendergast with thirtie shippes keeping the sea, tooke wines and other vituales from y<sup>e</sup> French, which though it pleased y<sup>e</sup> Noble men little, yet it did great ease to the common people, who had all such things farre the better cheape. About the 19. of August King Henry by determination of the counsell, sent his second sonne Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of Poike, and Thomas Earle of Dorset, and manie valiant men, with a strong power to helpe the Duke of Bliance, against the Duke of Burgoyne, or euer all the other were returned, which a while agoe went ouer with the Earle of Arundell to ayde the Duke of Burgoyne, so that many men marvelled at the sudden change, that in so small a time the Englishmen did aide the two contrary parts: notwithstanding the Nobles went sozeuward and arriued in Normandie, where when the Duke of Bliance did not meete them at the time appointed, they bent his townes, and spoiled the countrie, taking many holdes: at length, though late, the Dukes of Clarence, and Bliance met and talked together, and the matter was so entreated of betwene them, that our men should desist from ranging throughe the countrie, and refraine from robbetrie, which when our men had graunted, they departed into Aquitaine, to winter there, and the Duke of Bliance went home to his countrie.

An. reg. 14.

About this time the Lord Helle Marshall of Fraunce with manie other Noble men, and men of armes, to the number of 4000. besieged a certaine holde in Aquitaine, which was in the keeping of John Blunt Knight, who with 300. that aided him, put to flight the whole armie of the Frenchmen, and tooke of them 12. men of name, and other gentlemen to the number of 120. and amongst other the said Monsier de Helle Marshall of Fraunce was one, who was sent ouer into England, and put in the Castle of Wilsbich in Cambridge shire, but escaping thence, he got ouer into Fraunce, where he serued the Duke of Bliance, at the battaile of Agencourt, and was there slaine.

King Henry kept his Christmasse at his mannoz of Eltham, being so soze sicke, that sometime men thought that he had ben dead: notwithstanding it pleased God that he recovered strength a little, and as sofly as he could, he celebrated that feast of Christmasse.

A Parliament
at London.

After Christmasse hee called the Nobles of England to a parliament at London, which began the morrow after Candlemasse day, but he liued not to the ende thereof, soz he died shortly after in a chamber belonging to the abbot of Westminster, called Jerusalem, whereby the prophesie was fulfilled, as he said, that he should die there. In the time of whoselanguishing the King gaue to the Prince his sonne diuers notable doctrines and insigne-ments, that not onely of him, but of euery Prince are to be holden and fol- lowed: among the which cruditious one is this: The King lieng grieuou-ly diseased, called befoze him the Prince his sonne, and said vnto him: My sonne, I feare me soze, after my departure from this life, some discorde shall grow grow and arise betwene thee, and thy brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, whereby the Realme may be brought to destruction and miserie, for I know you both to be of great stomacke and courage. Wherefore I feare, that hee through his high minde will make some enterprise against thee, intending to vsurpe vpon thee, which I know thy stomacke may not abide easily. And for dread hereof as oft as it is in my remembrance, I sore repent mee, that euer I charged my selfe with the crowne of this Realme. To these words of the King, the prince answered thus: Right redoubted lord and father, to the pleasure of God your grace shall long continue with vs, and rule vs both: but if God haue so provided that euer I shall succed you in this Realme, I shall honour and loue my brethren aboue all men, as long as they be to me true, faithfully and obedient, as to their soueraigne Lord: but if any of them fortune to conspire or rebell against me, I assure you, I shall as soone execute iustice vpon one of them, as I shall vpon the worst and most simplest person within this your Realme.

The King hearing this answer, was therewith maruellously reioyced in his minde, and said: My deere and welbeloued Sonne, with this answer thou hast deliuered mee of a great and ponderous agony: and I beseech thee, and vpon my blessing charge thee, that like as thou hast sayde, so thou minister iustice equally, and in no wise suffer not them that bee oppressed long to call vpon thee for iustice, but redresse oppressions, and indifferently and without delay, for no perswasion of flatterers, or of them that be partiall, or such as to haue their hands replenished with giftes, deferre not iustice till to morrow, if that thou mayest do iustice this day, least (peradventure) God doe iustice on thee in the meane time, and take from thee thine authoritie: remember that the wealth of thy body, and thy soule, and of thy realme, resteth in the execution of iustice; and do not thy iustice so, that thou be called a Tyrant, but vse thy selfe meanely betwixt iustice and mercy in those thinges that belong to thee: And betwene parties do iustice truly and extreemely, to the consolation of thy poore Subiectes that suffer iniuries, and to the punishment of them that be extortioners and doers of oppressions, that other thereby may take example: and in thus doing, thou shalt obtaine the fauour of God, and the loue and feare of thy Subiectes, and therefore also thou shalt haue thy Realme more in tranquillitie and rest, which shall bee occasion of great prosperitie within thy Realme, which English men naturally desire: for so long as they haue wealth and riches, so long shalt thou haue obedience: and when they be poore, then they be alwayes ready at every motion to make insurrections, and it causeth them to rebell against their Soueraigne Lord: for the nature of them is such, rather to feare losing of their goddes and worldly substance, than the leoparding of their liues. And if thou thus keepe them in subiection mixed with loue and feare, thou shalt haue the most peaceable and fertile Countrey, and the most louing, faithful, and manly people of the world, which shall bee cause of no small feare to thine aduersaries. My sonne, when it shall please God to call mee to the way decreed for euery worldly Creature, to thee (as my sonne and heire)

I must leave my crowne and my Realme, which I aduise thee not to take vainely, and as a man elate in pride, and reioyced in worldly honour, but thinke that thou art more oppressed with charge, to purueie for euery person within the Realme, than exalted in vaine honour of the world. Thou shalt bee exalted vnto the crowne, for the wealth and conseruation of the Realme, and not for thy singular commoditie and auail: My sonne, thou shalt bee a minister to thy Realme to keepe it in tranquillitie and defend it. Like as the heart in the middelt of the body is principall and chiefe thing in the body, and serueth to couet and desire that thing that is most necessarie to euery of thy members, so (my sonne) thou shalt bee amongst thy people as chiefe and principall of them to minister, imagine and acquire those things that may be most beneficiall for them. And then thy people shall be obedient to thee, to ayde and succour thee, and in all things to accomplish thy commaundements, like as thy members labour, euery one of them in their office, to acquire and get that thing that the heart desireth, and as thy heart is of no force and impotent without the ayde of thy members, so without thy people, thy Realme is nothing. My sonne, thou shalt feare and dread God about all things, and thou shalt loue, honour and worship him with all thy heart, thou shalt attribute and ascribe to him all things wherein thou seest thy selfe to bee well fortunate, be it victorie of thine enemies, loue of thy friends, obedience of thy subiects, strength and actiuenesse of body, honour, riches, or fruitfull generations, or any other thing whatsoever it be that chanceth to thy pleasure. Thou shalt not imagine that any such thing should fortune to thee, by thine aete, nor by thy desert, but thou shalt thinke that all cometh onely of the goodnesse of the Lord. Thus thou shalt with all thine heart, prayse, honour, and thanke God for all his benefites that he giueth vnto thee. And in thy selfe eschew all vaine glorie and elation of heart, following the wholesome counsell of the Psalmist, which saeth, Non nobis Domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo da gloriam, which is to say, Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs, but to thy holy name be giuen laud and praise. These and many other admonishments and doctrines this victorious King gaue vnto this Noble Prince his Sonne, who with effect followed the same, after the death of his father: whereby hee obtained grace of our Lorde to attaine to great victories and many glorious and incredible conquests, thzough the helpe and succour of our Lord, wherof he was neuer destitute. The King his father drawing to his ende, after due thanks giuen, and supplications made to God, gaue his benediction to the Prince his sonne, and so yelded to God his spirit, the xx. of March, which was then midlent Sunday. Anno 1412. after the account of the Church of England, the yere of his age 46. whē he had reigned 13. yeres, sixe moneths lacking 10. Dayes. His body was conueyed by water to Feuertham, and from thence by land to Canterbury, and there buried by the Lady Mary his first wife, in the monastery of Christs Church. vnder a pillar in the North Ile. This King Henry, with Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterbury had been great benefactors to this Church, in building a good part of the body thereof

King Henry the fift.

the xx. day of March in the yere 1412. This Prince Titus Livius.
exceeded the meane stature of men, he was beautiful of visage, his necke long, body slender and leane, and his bones small: neuerthelesse he was of marvellous great strength, and passing swift in running, insomuch that he with two other of his Lords, without hounds, bow, or other engine, would take a wilde bucke or Doe in a large parke: he studied at Oxford in the newe colledge, vnder the government of Henry Bewfort his vnckle on the fathers side, then Chauncellour of Oxford, after Bishop of Winchester: hee delighted in songs, meters, and musicall instruments, insomuch that in his Chappell amongst other his priuate prayers, he used our Lords prayer, certaine psalmes of Dauid, with diuers hymnes and canticles, all which I haue sene translated into heroicall English meter, by Iohn Lydgate Monke of Bury. He liued somewhat insolently, insomuch that whilest his father liued, being accompanied with some of his young Lords and gentlemen, he would waite in disguised aray for his owne receiuers, and distresse them of their money: and sometimes at such enterprises both he and his company were surely beaten: and when his receiuers made to him their complaints how they were robbed in their coming vnto him, hee would giue them discharge of so much money as they had lost; and besides that, they should not depart from him without great rewards for their trouble and vexation, especially they should be rewarded that best had resisted him and his company, and of whom he had receiued the greatest and most strokes, and for example Sir Thomas Ebor wisseth thus. The renowned Prince King Henry the fift, during the life of his father, was noted to be fierce, and of wanton courage. It hapned that one of his seruants, whom he fauored, was for felony by him committed, arraigned, at the kings bench, whereof the Prince being aduertised, and incensed by sight persons about him, in furious rage came hastily to the bar, where his seruant stood as prisoner, and commaunded him to be vnguided and set at libertie, whereat all men were abashed, reserued the chiefe Justice, who humbly exhorted the Prince to be ordered according to the ancient lawes of the Realme, or if he would haue him saued from the rigor of the lawes, that he should obtaine if he might of the King his father, his gracious pardon, whereby no law or iustice should be derogate.

of the Kings bench, from the

the fourth, till the tyme of Henry the fift.

With the which answer the prince nothing appeared, but rather more inflamed, indeuoured himselfe to take away his seruant. The Iudge, considering the perillous example and inconueniencie that might thereby ensue, with a balliant spirit & courage commaunded the prince vpon his allegiance to leaue the prisoner, and to departe his way: with which commaundement, the prince being set all in a furie, all chased, and in a terrible maner came by to the place of iudgment, men thinking that he would haue slaine the Iudge, or haue done to him some damage, but the Iudge sitting still, without mouing, declaring the maiestie of the Kings place of iudgment, and with an assured bold countenance, had to the prince these words following: Sir, remember your selfe, I keepe here the place of the king your soueraigne lord and father, to whom you owe double obseisance, wherefore cōfession in his name I charge you desist off your wilfulnes and vnlawfull enterpryse, & from henceforth giue good example to those which hereafter shall be your proper subiects: and now for your contempt and disobedience, goe you to the prison of the kings bench, whereunto I commit you, and remaine you there prisoner untill the pleasure of the king your father be further knowne. With which words, being abashed, and also wondering at the marvellous grauitie of that worshipfull Iustice, the prince laying his weapon aparte, doing reuerence, departed and went to the kings bench as he was commaunded. Whereat his seruants disdaining, came & shewed to the king all the whole affaire. Whereat hee a while standing, after, as a man all raiſed with gladnes, holding his hands and eyes towards heauen, abrayd with a loud voice: O mercifull God! how much am I bounde to thy infinite godnes, especially for that thou hast giuen me a Iudge, who feareth not to minister iustice, and also a sonne, who can suffer semblably and obey iustice. Some (saith Thomas Eliot) here a man may behold three persons worthy memory: first a Iudge, who being a subiect, feared not to execute iustice on the eldest sonne of his soueraigne Lord, and by the order of nature his successeur. Also a prince, and sonne and heire of the K. in the middell of his folly, more considered his euill example, and the Iudges conscience in iustice, than his owne estate or wilfull appetite. Thirdly, a noble King and wise father, who contrary to the custome of parents, reioyced to see his sonne, and the heire of his crowne, to be for his disobedience by his subiect corrected: wherefore I conclude, that nothing is more honozable or to be desired in a prince, or noble man, than placability, as contrariwise nothing is so detestable, or to be feared in such a one as wrath and cruel malignitie. Thus much of his youthfulness: but after the decease of his father (as he that should succeed in the kingdom) he called to him a certaine monke of holy conuersation, to whom he confessed himselfe of all his offences, trespasses, and insolencies past, and after his counsaile in all things, at that time he reformed his life and manners, so that after his fathers decease was neuer no youth or wildnes that might haue place in him, but all his acts were sodainly changed into grauitie and discretion.

Titus Luſus.

To this noble prince (by assent of the parliament) all the estates of the realme realme, after thre daies, offered to doe fealtie befoze her was crowned oꝝ had solemnized his oth, well and iustly to gouerne the common weale, which offer, befoze was neuer found to be made to any pꝛince of England.

The King gaue them al generally thanks, foꝝ their good mindes towarde him, and therewith exhorted them to the zeale of the publike prosperitie and honour of the realme. If any man had offended him he pardoned their trespass, and desired hartly of God, that if he should rule and doe all things well to the honour of God and the prosperous commoditie of the Realme, that then God would suffer him to be crowned: but if his fortune should be to do other wise, that then God should take him to his mercie, and suffer him rather to be buried than to enterpryse the charge of the Realme.

The ninth day of April he was crowned at Westminster, by Thomas Arundel archbishop of Canturburie, after which coronation, he called vnto him all those yong Lords & gentlemen that were the followers of his yong aces, to euery one of whom he gaue rich and bounteous gifts, and then commanded that as many as would change their manners as he intended to doe should abide with him in his court, and to all that would perseuer in their former light conuersation, he gaue expresse commaundement vpon paine of their heads, neuer after that day to come in his presence.

Hauiug auoyded those yong and suspicious company from his presence, he then attended to ghostly and worldly busines. And first he commanded to edifie his royal manoir that then was called Shæne (and now Richmond) he also founded two monasteries vpon the Thames (not far from the said manoir royall) the one of the religion of the Cartusiers, which he named Bethlem: the other of religious men and women, of S. Brigets order, and that he named Sion. In this house there were 60. sisters 13. pꝛiests 4. deacons and 8. late bꝛethꝛ, those neuer wore linnen but wollen, which two conents had but one church in commo, the nuns had their church aloft in the rose, and the bꝛethꝛen beneath vpon the ground, ech conent generally inclosed, and after their profession, mought neuer come out, except by the Popes special licence: these ought to haue sufficient dowrie to sustaine them without begging, he indowed them with rents and reuenues taken from the pꝛiories allians which he suppressed.

Richmond,
Shene, and Sion built.

He by the best aduilement he could, pꝛouided, and ordeined in euery part of his Realme, Judges, and other officers, such as he beleued to be true and iust, and others that were knowne oꝝ suspect of couetousnes oꝝ partialitie, he cleerly auoyded from their former offices & romes. He also (as King Henric his father had done) vsed foꝝ custome euerie day, when no state was kept, at after dinner, to haue a cushion layd on the cupboꝝde, and there to leane the space of an houre oꝝ moze, to receiue bills, and heare complaints of whomsoever would come, & in those dayes if the King sate in the chamber, the steward of the houshold sate alway in the hal vnder the cloth of estate, the same being rolled vp aboue his head, and such Knights sitting with him as at that time waited on the King.

The same time the fauourers of Wicliffes doctrine, did nuple bp scedules vpon the Church doores of London, which scedules contayned that there was an hundred thousand men ready to rise against al such as could not away with their sect, for indeed (saith Walsingham) they trusted to the force, power, and wit of a certaine knight called Iohn Olde-castell of Coling in Kent, who for the honour of a marriage, which he had contracted with a kinswoman of a nobleman, the Lord Cobham, obtayned the name of the said Lordship, or seignorie of Cobham: this Iohn was a strong man, and a mætelv god man of war, but he was a most peruerse enemy to y<sup>e</sup> state of the Church at that time. In a synode therfore being holden at London, the said Sir Iohn Old-castell, for diuers points touching the sacrament, befoze the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Winchester and other, was conuict, and committed to the tower of London, out of the which he brake ouer the wals in the night, and escaped about the feast of Simon and Iude.

King.

The King keeping his Christmase at his mannoz of Eltham (seuen miles from London) was warned that certaine had conspired against him, either to haue taken, or sodainly slaine him and his brethren on Twelfth day at night, whercupon the King sent word to the Maior of London, that he should arrest all suspicious persons: the Maior therfore caused euery Alderman in his warde to kepe great watch, and about tenne of the clocke at night went himselfe with a strong power, to the signe of the Arc without Bishops Gate, where they apprehended the man of the house called Iohn Burgate carpenter and seuen other, one of them being an Esquire belonging to Sir Iohn Old-castell, and sent them to Eltham, where they con-felled befoze the King that they were confederate with Sir Iohn Old-castell, to fight againſt him and his Lords in Saint Giles field about Holbozne. On the morrowe after the Twelfth day, the King remoued priuily to Weſtminiſter, and becauſe he had heard tell that the rude peoples intent was, if they did preuaile, firſt to deſtroy the monaſteries of Weſtminiſter, Saint Al-bons, and Saint Pauls, and all the houſes of friers in London: he minding to prevent ſuch a miſchiefe, contrary to the mindes of all that were about him, went into the fielde when it was little paſt midnight, with a great armie, for he was warned that Sir Iohn Old-castell, and Sir Roger Aſton, would be in the ſame ſielde on the next day following with 25000. people:

King Henry kept his Lent in the Castle of Beinelworth, and caused an harbor there to be planted in the marsh, for his pleasure, amongst the thozns and bushes: where a fore had harbozed, which fore he killed, being a thing then thought to prognosticate, that he should expell the craftie deceit of the French King, besides which also he there builded a most pleasant place, and caused it to bee termed Le pleasant maries, or the pleasant marsh. King Henry the 8. bestowed great cost in repairing Beinelworth Castle, caused the said banke-ting house to be taken downe, and part of it to be set vp in the base court at Billingsworth. In this Lent season, whilst the King lay at Beinelworth, messengers came to him from the Dolphin of France named Charles, with a present of Paris balles, for him to play withall, but the King wrote to him, that he would shortly send to him London balles, with the which he would breake downe the rofes of houses.

Anno reg. 2.

King Henry, after that all dissentions and commotions in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales were appeased, so that concord and vnitie were made and established in all parts of the Kings dominion, the King deliberated vpon the recovery of the Realme of Fraunce, which by iust title of inheritance was descended vnto him, and at that time was inturiously withhelden from him by the French King. And because he would nothing procede against the pleasure of God, he first demanded aduise, and counsell of all the discrete and learned men as well of the spirituality in both Uniuersties, as of the temporality through all his Realme, if he mought without offence to God lawfully recouer by armes his Realme of Fraunce. Who after long deliberation thereupon among them had, of one assent, made report vnto the King, that in so iust a quarrell he mought lawfully vse armes, if he might by none other wayes attaine his purpose, and right of inheritance: wherevpon the King, in all things insuing the aduise of his Counsell, sent Ambassadors into France, there to demand his right in the Counsell of the French, and if peradventure they would deny to accomplish his desire, his Ambassadors should giue them knowledge that he would seke his right by armes. These Ambassadors were honorably receiued in Fraunce, and for answer of their message there denounced, they brought with them nothing to report, except that within short time, the Frenchmen would send their Ambassadors into England, to declare their intent to the King of England vpon his demand.

Shortly after arriued in England W. Bouratier Archbishop of Bourges, the Earle of Glendofne, Pierce Frennall Bishop of Luccr, the Lords Luery, and of Braquimount, Walter Cole secretarie to the French King, Ambassadors of Fraunce, these were men of great authority: amongst them the Archbishop was the chiefe, who in like manner were here receiued with great honor. At a time limited, the Archbishop of Bourges proposed their message, and in the ende, offered to the King lands, and a great sum of money with the daughter of the King their master in marriage, so that he would desist from that warre that he then intended to make in France. After which proposition and offer made, the Ambassadors dined with the King: and at another day limited, the King of England, by the mouth of the Archbishop of Canterbury made to them answer, to this effect: The proffers made, he said, were not sufficient recompence for the Kings rightfull inheritance in France, unjustly detained from him, wherefore for a small answer, he would demand his right by force of armes in the best manner that he could, and that as bided as to him were possible. Then the Archbishop of Bourges, after licence obtained, said: O King, with reverence best spoken, thinkest thou unjustly to depose the most Christian King of France? Thinkest thou that he hath offered to thee these lands and money, with his owne daughter to be thy wife, for any dread he hath of thee: nay not so, but the same our Lord, indued with pittie, as the lover of peace, hath made to thee this offer, to the intent, that innocent blood be not spilt and destroyed: and therefore by the aide of God, he shall at all times defend himselfe, his lands, and subiects, from thy unjust inuasions. And as to vs that be his Ambassadors, we desire thee, to make to vs safe conduct without damage through thy realme, and also that thou write to our soueraigne Lord, this thine answer entirely vnder thy seale, and signe manuell: which request the King granted vnto them, and they returned into France.

In the moneth of May a Parliament was begun at Leicester, in the beginning whereof, there was a porter of the tower of London, drawn, hanged, and headed, whose head was sent to London, and set ouer the tower gate, for consenting to one that brake out of the tower, named Whillocke.

In this Parliament Iohn the Kings brother was made Duke of Bedford, Humfrey his brother Duke of Gloucester, and Richard brother to the Duke of Yorke was made Earle of Cambridge. The priories allians in England were giuen to the King, all their possessions to remaine to the King and to his heirs for ever, except land graunted to the colledge of Fodringhay, and after all these priories were suppressed to the number of more than one hundred houses. Gold waights were appoynted.

Priories suppressed to the number of 110.

In this Parliament were deuised diuers meanes to gather money of al the commons of England, therewith to sustaine the Kings wars, and to make prouision of all things necessarie for the same, the sum whereof, leuied and gathered of the spirituallie and tempozaltie amounted to the sum of 300. thousand markes English. And heer with order was taken to gather a great host of men through all the Kings dominions.

On Mary Magdalens day, in London, Iohn Nianfer Esquire, with nine of his men, set vpon and slue Iohn Tibbey Clarke, Archdeacon of Huntington, and Chancellor to Quene Ioane, late wife to Henry the fourth, for the which fact, the said Esquire, and foure of his men fled to S. Annes Church within Aldersgate, where they were mured vp with boord, and watched day and night till the 21. of August, on the which day, they forswore the laud, and passed through the cite towards Calice in their shirts and breeches, each of them hauing a Crosse in his hand, and a purse about his necke, &c.

Our Ambassadors, the Bishops of Durham and Norwich, returning not to the second time out of Fraunce, declared to the King, that the Frenchmen did but vse fraud and deceits, wherefore the King being stirred vp vnto anger, and also knowing well the discord betwixt the great Lords of Fraunce, whereof hath somewhat been said before, determined to abate their scorninges, and to teach them to vnderstand their folly, in awaking of a sleeping dog: and forthwith, the King commaunded all the prelates, and Nobles of the Realme, to come to London, there to intreate of waighty affaires concerning the Realme, at the which time, the Archbishop of Canterbury held a great counsell, in the which were chosen certaine of the clergie of England, to goe to the generall Counsell that should be holden at Constance, a citie of Germany, and so there were sent the Bishops of Salisburie, Bathe, and Hereford, and with them the Abbot of Westminster, and the B: of Worcester, and many other wise men, in company of the Earle of Marwicke, whose presence did them much honour.

In the meane space, the King like a prudent Prince thought good to take order for the resisting of the Scots, if according to their old maner, they should attempt any thing in his absence, and therefore he appointed the Earle of Westmerland, the Lord Scrope, the baron Greystocke, Sir Robert Vinfreuil, and diuers other valiant captaines to keepe the frontiers and marches of Scotland: which Sir Robert Vinfreuil on the day of Mary Magdalen, fought with the Scots at the towne of Cederling, hauing in his company only 300. archers, and 140. men of armes, where after a long conflict, he slue of his enemies 60. and od, and toke 360. prisoners, and put to flight 1000. and mo, whom he followed in chase aboue 12. miles, and so laden with prayes and prisoners, returned to the Castle of Rockborough, whereof he was then capitaine. When the king had gathered his nauie together, appointed his archers, and men of armes, prepared his engins, and al things necessarie for the wars, he leauing behind him for gouernment of the Realme, the Quene his mother in law, he commaunded all that should goe with him, to be ready against the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, and to meete him at Hampton.

discouered.

The eighteenth day of Iune, King Henry with many Lords and others rode from London towards South-hampton, the Maior, Aldermen, and craftes of the Citie accompanying him on his way to the towne of Kingstons vpon Thames: whilst the King late at Southampton, where he abode for his retinue and stuffe longing to the wars, fastings, prayers vnto God, and almes deedes of the King, and other supplications of the clergie and commons had before, he mustered his vniuersall hoste vpon the sea bankes. In the which muster or view, on the last of Iulie was discouered a great and perillous conspiracie against him by thre Lords, in whom of all the rest, hee put greaest trust and confidence, the chiefe of them was

Henry

Henry Scrope, Lord treasurer: the second Richard Earle of Cambridge, brother to Edward Duke of Yorke, and Sir Thomas Grey, a knight of the Porrb, these had made Edmond Earle of March to sweare upon a booke, not to disclose their counsell, and then tolde him that they thought to slay the King, and to make the sayde Edmond King, the which if hee refused to take vpon him, they would slay him: whereupon, the Earle prayed them to giue him one houres space to take aduise what was best to doe, which being graunted, the Earle went secretly and tolde the King thereof, who caused them forthwith to bee apprehended, and brought before him, where they confessed the treason, for the which on the first of August they were arraigned in the Kings presence, and the same day all three beheaded. The Earle was buried heade and all, but the other heads were sent, the one to Yorke, the other to Newcastle vpon Tyne, and there set vbye. It is to bee noted, that whatsoeuer hath bene reported of the confession of the Earle of Cambridge, certaine it is that hee was indighted by the name of Richard Earle of Cambridge of Conesburge in the Countie of Yorke Knight, and with him Thomas Grey of Heton in the Countie of Northumberland Knight, for that they the twentieth day of Iulie in the third yere of King Henry the fifth, at Southampton, and diuers other places within the Realme had conspired together, with a power of men to them associate, without the Kings licence to haue led away the Lord Edmond Earle of March into Wales, and then to haue procured him to take vpon him the gouernment of the Realme, in case that King Richard the second were dead: and betewith had purposed to set forth a proclamation there in Wales, in the name of the saide Earle of March, as heire of the crowne, against King Henry by the name of Henry of Lancaster the vsurper, to the ende that by such meanes they mought drawe the more number of the Kings liege people vnto the sayd Earle. And further to haue conueyed a banner of the armes of England, and a certaine crowne of Spaine set vpon a pallet, and laid in gage to the sayde Earle of Cambridge, by the King together with the said Earle of March into the parts of Wales aforesaide. And further that the said Earle of Cambridge, and Sir Thomas Gray had appointed certaine of the Kings liege people to repaire into Scotland, and to bring from thence, one Thomas Trumpington, also an other resembling in shape, fauour and countenance King Richard, and Henry Percy together with a great multitude of people to fight with the King, and him to destroy in open felde: besides this, that they had meant to win certaine Castles in Wales, and to keepe them against the King, and many other treasons they had contriued, as by the indictment was specified, to the ende they mought destroy the King and his brethren, the Dukes of Bedford, and of Gloucester, and other the great Lords and pères of the Realme. And Henry Scrope of Halsham of Flarlot, in the Countie of Yorke, was likewise indited, as consenting to the premises, so that it appeareth their purpose was well enough then perceiued, although happily not much hunted abroade, for considerations thought necessarie to haue it kept hysyt.

King Henry hauing assembled his hoste at Southampton, as is aforesaid, to the intent to passe the seas, for conueyance of whom and of his victuals and artillery, were prouided and brought thither for his wages out of Holland and Zeland ships, hulkes, and other vessels to such a number, that his whole naue at his departing from the land amounted to sixtene hundred sailes.

King Henry
sailed into Normandie.

On the xliii. of August the King toke shipping, and entred the sea, and on the xliiii. at night arriued at Bebecaur in Normandie, which is betwixte Harflete and Humflete, of whose connting, all the Cities, and States of those parts being aduertised, were stricken with great feare. The King, the Dukes of Clarence and of Gloucester his brethren, the Duke of Poike his uncle, the Carles, Barons, Knights, gentlemen, and Souldiers, cast their ankers there, and toke lande without any resistance, and the King forthwith falling to the ground vpon his knees deuoutly prayed to God that to his honor he would giue him iustice of his enemies. He had at his landing in his hoste sixe thousand speares, and xxliiii. thousand footemen, besides gunners, and other engineers, artificers, and laborers, of whom the king had great abundance.

Titus Livius

The King gaue to diuers gentlemen the order of knight-hood, and assigned the bearing of his standards and banners to such men, as he knew to be of great strength and prowesse. All thing being set in good order and array, the King with all his host ascended to the top of an high hill there nigh, and there he rested the next day.

On the 16. day of August, the Duke of Clarence, leader of the forewarde in good ordinance, entred his iourney toward a towne called Herflete, distant from Bebecaur scarcely thre leagues, where he lodged his host in a field befoze the towne. The King at his conuning, lodged himselfe nigh to the first warde, not farre from the towne in a plaine field. The Earle of Suffolke, Michaell at Poole, chiefe taine of the rereward, lodged on the other side befoze the Towne. Other Noble men that had the conduct of the two wings, lodged them, one on the right hand, the other on the left hand of the whole hoste. When the King commaunded to be proclaimed throug the host, that vpon paine of death, all Churches should be kept inuolate, vnspoiled and vnharmed, that no man should presume to take any vessell or ornament whatsoever from the Church, that they should not hurt any man of the church, whom they found without armour, nor any woman or childe, and then forthwith were sent to the towne, men of armes in great number, to see the scituation thereof, who shortly returned with a great pray of cattell, and informed the King of all his demands.

Enguerant.
Description of Herflete.

Herflete is the key of the sea of all Normandie, and is scituated vpon the sea side, by the riuer of Seane, betwixt two hills, and through the middle thereof runneth a riuer, which not farre from the same towne entreth into the Seane, and from thence, both those riuers in one descend into the sea, whereas a great and goodly haven is, belonging to the same towne, which haven is garnished with the defence of two faire and strong towers: and in the same haue a right great naule of shippes may ride in safetie: and if the inhabitants of this towne inclose and keepe within the towne the course of the foresaid riuer by their sluces, as they may right well doe, then the riuer riseth without the towne so high, that it fozeeloseth all entries to the wals, so that no man may approach the towne on that part. This towne is also defended with high and thicke wals and towres, and is also enuironed with broad and deepe ditches. To this towne also belongeth onely two gates for entries, the one called Calturances, the other Postrouillier. In this towne, besides the inhabitants thereof, for the defence of the same, were sower hundred men of armes deputed in garrison, amongst whom were these Lords, Lord Discouteuile, chiefe captaine of the towne, Lord Blanuile, Lord Haqueuile, Lord Harmanuile, Lord Eancourt, Lord Gailard Bos, and diuers other Lords and men expert in warre. These Lords caused their people to breake downe the causeway betwixt Pontstreuillers and Herefete, to impaire and hinder the Englishmens passage. Neuerthelesse the Englishmen at their comming, by the good conduct of their King, were not so soze oppzessed, by breaking of the causeway, but that they came so nigh as to lay their siege before the towne. When the King and all his host was come before the towne, all his tents and pavilions were set vp in the plaine field, wherewith that part of the towne was intirely inclosed: he also caused his great hall to be set vpon an hill, at the backe of his host, to serue as a Church, there to honoz and serue God. This done the King commaunding the Duke of Clarence to assaige the towne, he endeuored to conuey his people over the riuer, in the passage whereof, he had a great skirmish with the inhabitants of the towne, but at the last his aduerfaries being put to flight, recoped within the wals. The Duke conueyed over the riuer all his ward and companie, and because the riuer diuided the Kings camp from the Dukes, they ordained a readie and sure passage over the same riuer betwixt both the camps, to the keeping whereof, certaine Gentlemen were appointed, so that their enemies might not endamage them neither by water noz land.

In this meane time befell a great misaduenture to the Frenchmen that were besieged, for the gunpowder and shot that was sent vnto them by the French King, was incountred vpon the sea by the Englishmen, and taken, to their great displeasure and damage.

The King gaue the charge of the fiede to his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloucester. On the same side the riuer that the King lay, was the Duke of Poike, high Constable of England lodged with his band. When euery man was placed, the towne was so streightly assaiged, that all entries and issues of the towne were stopped, so that they of the towne were in dispaire to haue any succour from the Realme of Fraunce. Many engins were raised by the English, which in short time should haue been the destruction of the wals, if they of the towne had not the sower stopped the riuer of the same towne within, whereby the water gathered and raised without the towne betwixt the King and the D. of Clarence, to the semblance of a little sea, which caused the Englishmen to withdraw their guns, and other engines, whereby at that time the walls were saved. When the King caused to be made under the water three great mines unto the walls of the towne, which in like manner had been the cause of their ruine, if the inhabitants had not countermined them, and letted their purpose. The inhabitants of the towne perceiving themselves thus straightly assaged, as well by land as by sea, conveyed all their ships within their haven, and bounde them together with chaines, and in the two towers that were made for the defence of the haven, they put certaine garrisons, and armed men, who oftentimes attempted to invade the Kings naue, but at all times they were by his ships beaten, and constrained to recule still within their haven: at the last, the captaines and inhabitants considering that by such skirmishes (as well vpon the land as vpon the sea) they gained nothing, tooke this appointment with the King, that if they were not rescued by the Frenchmen within certaine dayes limited, they should then deliuer into his hands the towne, with thirtie persons of the greatest and most noble within the towne, such as the King would desire, to bee ordered at the Kings pleasure; and all the residue, as well men of warre, as the inhabitants of the same towne, without armour, and leauing behinde them their goods, should freely goe where they would, for the suretie of which appointment to be kept, they deliuered vnto the King twelue of their greatest personages for pledges. The captaines and inhabitants of the towne seeing their day of appointment to approach, and themselves utterly desperate of any succours of their people, obtained to performe their couenant at their day desired, which was the xxiij. of September, on which day came Sir Lionell Braquemount, gouernour of the towne, vnto the King, and kneeling befoze him, said: Most victorious Prince, beholde here the keyes of this towne, which after our promise I yelde vnto you, with the towne, my selfe, and my companie. Then were brought to the King the Lord Coreuile, the Lord Gangcourt, and other, to the number of thirtie, and all the residue, as well souldiers, as inhabitants, were suffered vnarmed to depart. When the gates of the towne were opened, and that the King approached vnto them, in purpose to enter the towne, he descended from his horse without the gate, and from thence, without hose or shoes in great deuotion, he went immediately to the Church of Saint Martin, Metropolitane of that towne, and there he made his prayers, and praised God his creator, for his good fortune: then hee commaunded to bee brought befoze him, all those Lords and gentlemen that were yeldd to him for prisoners, whose names he caused to be put in writing, and vpon their othes to yelde themselves prisoners at Calice vpon Saint Martins day next following, and so they were deliuered out of the towne of Harflew, at the which day according to their appointment, they came to Calice, where they were receiued as prisoners, and after ransomed at great finannes. After the deliery of this towne, the foresaid two towers that defended the haven, and resisted the Kings power ten dayes space, at the end whereof, because they were in despaire of succour, yeldded them to the King, and all the souldiers and and inhabitants both of the Towne and Towers were suffered to go freely vnarmed, whither they would. The king constitute Captaine of the Towne sir Thomas Beawford Earle of Dorset his vnckle, to whom he also committed two thousand souldiers, chosen men of his host. When considering that winter drew on, as also the losse of their men, by reason of the sir then raining amongst them, by which infirmitie died Michaell at Poole, Earle of Suffolke, the Bishop of Norwich, the Lord Beawmont, and others, and of the commons, to the number of two thousand and aboue. King Henry created the sonne of Michaell at Poole, Earle of Suffolke, who liued not long after.

After king Henry had remained at Hareflēt 15. daies, after the deliuey of the Towne, and of the Towers, he departed from thence towards Calice, whercof, when his enemies were aduertised, and also by what way he intended to passe, all the people of the countrey, Cities, and Townes were maruellously oppressed with feare, wherefore they hastened them to defensible places, and other that were apt to warre, tooke them to their houses, and assembled them together in great number, with no small company of footemen, and in all that they might they oppressed the Englishmen.

Titus Linius

The kings host kept an easie pace, without making any haste, and when they approached the Towne of Ewe, their enemies assailed them in the fields with great force and noise, where on both parties it was foughten soze and vigorously: but the Frenchmen recoiled to the Towne, where they were in good surety. From thence the king departed, and came to a passage of the riuier of Some, which the Frenchmen call Blancheffoke, or Blanchtache. This passage, at the coming vnto it was fired with sharpe stakes by their enemies, so that they coulde not passe there, but were constrained to goe further, seeking their passage, vntill they came directly to haue the Citie of Amiens and the Castell of Corby on their left side, where they of the said Citie beganne with them a newe fight: but they were sone forced by the English to returne to their Citie againe. The 19. of October the king passed the riuier of Some, at the passage of Wienna, and Bethew-court, and went then to lodge him at Pouche-legach, from whence, he aduanced him towards the riuier of Piramont. In the meane time, the French King and the Duke of Guyen his sonne, then Dolphin, purposing to resist the Englishmen, came to Roane, from whence, they sent thre heraults to the King of England, to giue vnderstanding that he should not escape without battaile: vnto whom the said King answered, All things be done at the pleasure of God, I will keepe the right way towarde Calcis: if our aduersaries doe attempt to disturbe vs in our iourney, we thinke they shall not doe it without their owne great daunger and perill. From thence, King Henry removed to a villiage called Forceulle, aduancing his host towarde the riuier of Piramont, and the next day they passed by the Cherre, and the King lodged that night at Bonpers-lestailon. The next day the King removed vnto Bangy. The next day late in the night the King came to a villiage named Agencourt, Enguerant saith Palencelles, where they lodged not distant from the French host not aboue two hundred and fiftie spaces.

The battell of Agen court,
9. Iulijam.

The Frenchmen fired their banners and standerts with the banner royall, whereof the Constable had the Conduat, in the field by them deuised and chosen, which was in the county of Saint Paule, in the ground of Agen court, by which the day following, the Englishmen should passe to goe to Calais.

The xxv. of October, after prayers and supplications of the king, his priests and people done with great deuotion, the king of England in the morning very early set forth his host in array: He commaunded that his horses and other carriages should be left in the village where he had lodged. The order of his field was thus: The middle battell whereof the king was conductoꝝ, was set in the midst of the field, directly against the middle battell of his aduersaries. On the right side was the first battell, and therewith the right wing: and on the left side the last battell, and the left wing. And these battells ioyning nigh together, by the prouidence of God, proued vnto this king a defensible place for his host, for the village wherein he was lodged before, defended his host from all inuasions on the backe, and the field wherein he was, was defended on both sides with two small riuers.

This Noble King was armed with sure and right beautifull armour: on his head a bright helmet, whereupon was set a Crowne of golde, repleate with pearle and precious stones, marvellous rich: In his shield he bare the armes both of England & Fraunce. And thus armed, he was mounted vpon a goodly great horse, and after him were ledde certaine noble horses, with their bridles and trappers of Goldsmithes worke, and vpon them also were beaten the armes of England and of Fraunce. Thus this victorious king prepared to battaile, encouraged his people to the field that approached at hande.

The night before this cruell battell, by the aduise and counsell (as it is said) of the Duke of Yorke, the king had giuen commaundement througħ his host, that euery man should puruey him a stake sharpe at both endes, which the Englishmen fired in the ground before them in the field, to defend them from the oppression of horsemen. The Frenchmen had such confidence in the great multitude of their people, and in their great horses, that many of their great Princes and Lords leauing behinde them their souldiers, standerts and other ensignes, came towards the Englishmen in right great haste, as if they had bene assured of victory.

The King of England forthwith aduanced his banners and standerts towards the French host, and he in person with his battaile in the same order wherein he stood, followed, exhorting and encouraging euery man to battell, notwithstanding he went to inuade his enemies, yet kept his accustomed order, that is, that the first battell went before, the second battell followed, and the third came immediately after, he commaunded his priests to abide in prayers, and deuine supplications, and his heraulds in their coates of armes to attend to their offices. Then euery man fell prostrate to the ground, and committing themselves to God, euery of them toke in his mouth a little peece of earth, in remembrance that they were mortall, and made of earth, as also in remembrance of the holy communion. Thus all their carriages and baggages left behinde, onely charged with their harness, weapons, and stakes, they marched toward their enemies, with great hute and noise. They sounded their trumpets, and stroke by their drummes, which greatly encouraged the hearts of euery man. Their enemies seeing them approach, advanced themselves also, and met them in the fildes, betwixt whom was begunne a marueilous fierce and cruell battell. The battell of the Englishmen was as long as the field wherein they fought, which was greatly to their aduantage, for by that their enemies were letted to come vpon them at the sides and backe of the hoste. The Frenchmen had ordainned their battells with two sharpe fronts, like vnto two hoznes, which alwayes backward was broader and broader: these sharpe battells set vpon the English middlewarde, intending to haue runne thzough the whole fildes, but the Frenchmen were slaine and wounded by the English Archers, and by the helpe of the stakes, which the Englishmen had fired before them in the ground, whereby the hozemen were constrained to returne, or else to runne vpon the stakes, where many of them were overthrowne and wounded, and many both hozes and men slaine. The battell and fight increased maruellously, by the space of thre houres, in all which time no man was taken prisoner, but an innumerable number were slaine, vpon whose dead bodies they that followed were throwne and slaine.

Thus after a long and cruell battell, by the demerits of their great pride, there approached no man of the French to battell, but to death, of whom after that an innumerable company were slaine, and that the victorie surely remained to the Englishmen, they spared to slay, and toke prisoners of the French, both Princes and Gentlemen in great number. In this mortall battell, the Noble king of England neuer failed his men, for no danger of death, but fought with his enemies with an ardent heart, as a famished Lion for his pray, receiuing on his helmet and on the residue of his armour, many and great strokes.

In this field, as the puissant Prince Humfrey Duke of Gloucester the Kings brother, fought with great courage and force, he was soze wounded in the hammes with a sword, and overthrowne, insomuch, as he lay as halfe dead in the field, his head toward the Englishmen, and his feet towards his enemies: vpon whom the King hauing a brotherly compassion, bestrode him, and with most strong battell and labour, not without his owne great perill, like a brother he defended, and succoured his brother from the enemies, and made the Duke to be bozn out of the field amongst his owne men.

At the last, the victorie obtained, and the great hoste of the Frenchmen overcome, slaine, wounded, taken and banquished, sozthwith an other hoste of Frenchmen, no lesse than the first, supposing the Englishmen to be wearied by their long trauell and fight, disposed them to beginne againe the battell anew. When the Englishmen (which had many moe prisoners

prisoners than they were of themselves in number) saw this new field assembled to give them battell againe, fearing in this new field, lest they should fight both against their prisoners, and their other enemies, they put to death many of their said prisoners, both noble & rich men, among whom the Duke of Brabant, who at that field was taken prisoner, was one.
